Local offices would get own budgets

Furore over Field's plans for welfare

Boy of five shot dead in 'contract killing' blunder

By PAUL WILKINSON

dead last night by a gunman wearing a motor-cycle crash helmet, apparently in a contract killing that went wrong. The boy was shot in the head and his father, believed to be the real target, was shot in the stomach as they walked from their car towards their home in Bolton.

The injured man, who was last night undergoing surgery at Bolton General Infirmary, was said by neighbours to be John Bates. The boy is understood to have been his son

Dylan. Mary Cooper, who saw the attack, said: "A man wearing a motorbike helmet jumped out of a yellow Mini Metro, shot at the man and boy, then ran off down an alley. When I looked round I saw a man in the middle of the street holding a little boy covered in blood. The man was crying hysterically, clinging to the little boy."

She ran across and put the boy in the recovery position. She said he was still clutching a toy and had been shot twice in the back of the head. "He was in a terrible state. I did not realise that the man had been shot. I thought all the blood was coming from the child. It was only a couple of minutes later that I realised the man helmet as he went. "The shot man was holding his son in his arms as he lay on the pavement. There was a lot of blood."

Dawn Blake of Greater

Manchester Ambulance Service said: "We received a call at ten past five telling us there had been a shooting in Bolton. When our crew arrived they discovered that a five-year-old had died as a result of a bullet wound to the head. We also had a male adult who had suffered a bullet wound to the abdomen. They were both taken to hospital.

We don't have absolute confirmation of the man's condition but certainly a bullet vound to the stomach cannot be considered a minor injury."

The killer's car was left abandoned in the street where the shooting took place. Neighbours reported hearing the sound of another car driving away at high speed.

Greater Manchester police sealed off the area, a network of narrow small streets close to a main route west. Officers then began house to house

Gourmets gluttons for school food

On no, not turbotin au gratin coulis

By David Charter EDUCATION CORRESPONDENT chool cuisine.

BOARDING school cuisine. long regarded as the lowest form of culinary life, may now match standards in some of the country's top restaurants. Uppingham School in Rutland, where a place at table (plus education) costs £12,750 a year, challenged food critics to sample its fare. The results, published in The Egon Ronay Guide in its first ever assessment of school dinners, found the food far removed from the semolina-and-stodge image.

The inspectors are now planning a guide to boarding

In a six-page report, inspectors said that a variety of curries and a "pleasantly spicy well-seasoned" chilli con carne at the 400-year-old alma mater of Stephen Fry were on a par with meals at restaurants in the company's annual guide to the best tables.

Inspectors reported that the school's own dish Chicken Uppingham-style was an attractive "poached breast wrapped in streaky bacon surrounded by leek and tarragon sauce". Special praise was reserved for the chicken curry cooked with fresh spices, and for "a good wellflavoured beef curry comprising small, tender chunks of meat in a rich, not-too-spicy

The assessors even called for second helpings of "excellent chocolate crispie cakes that were rich and sticky". They baulked at tinned tomatoes and toasted sandwiches made with processed cheese, only to be told that the pupils Uppingham, whose 640 pupils include the son of Stephen Dorrell, Shadow Education Secretary, has 13 boarding houses, 11 kitchens and 26 cooks. Chris Lewis, managing director of The Egon Ronay

Guides, said: "It was a first for us and something we would like to do more of. There could be an Egon Ronay guide soon." One of the school's old boys.

CJD threat 'is underestimated'

Government scientist warns that complacency may lead to Europe-wide epidemic, reports Nigel Hawkes

A LEADING expert on Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease has warned of a growing sense of complacency over the chances of a major epidemic.

Dr John Collinge of St Mary's Hospital in London says that although the number of cases of the new form of the disease believed to be caused by infected beef has not risen as quickly as some people feared, a major epidemic could still occur. It may only involve hundreds, but it could be Europe-wide and become a disaster of biblical proportions." Dr Collinge said. "We have to face the possibility of a disaster with tens of thousands of cases."

This prospect is not new, he said, but there is a danger that it is being discounted too quickly. The chairman of the Government's advisory committee on CJD-like diseases. Professor John Pattison, warned 18 months ago of the possibility of half a million deaths. Since then, the actual numbers have risen to only 21. "There seems to be a revisionist view gaining ground in the press not only that the link between bovine spongiform encephalopathy. or "mad cow" disease, and new variant CJD is not clearly established, but that the epidemic is likely to be small." Dr Collinge said.

"In fact the link is very clearly established, and there are going to be a lot more cases. We are still in the dark about how many, but we have to prepare for the worst." In the past control the progress of the disease is an denied that there was any sense of week, one confirmed case of new variant CID and one suspected case have emerged. Sue Carey. 36. a mother of four who was living in Lincolnshire at the time of her death in March, has been confirmed by the CJD Surveillance Unit in Edinburgh

Mandy Minto, 27. a former European Judo Champion from Grangetown, Sunderland, died eight months after falling ill and is also suspected of being a victim of CJD. Confirmation awaits detailed examination of her brain tissue, the only certain way for diagnosing the

as a victim of the new variant.

Dr Collinge believes that a drug to possible and could be available complacency within the Government over CID. Since SEAC reported on the pharmaceutical industry do more," he said.

"But I can understand why they are reluctant. The number of cases is still small, so it is hard for them to justify heavy spending. But if they wait until there are many cases, it will be too late."

He has no complaints about the support for his own research, most of which has come not from Government sources but from the Wellcome Trust, "I don't believe that throwing money at the problem would necessarily help, anyway," he said.

A Health Department spokesworn-

the possible link between "mad cow" disease and the new variant form of CJD, a number of new research projects have begun after the department and the Medical Research Council called for proposals from researchers.

Dr Collinge himself eats beef, arguing that it would be illogical to avoid it now that the infected material has been removed. He has no children but admitted that if he had he would be reluctant to give them beef or beef products.

The Sinn Fein delegation arriving at Stormont Castle yesterday to meet the Northern Ireland Secretary, led by the MPs Gerry Adams and Martin McGuinness

Mowlam meets republican leadership

FROM MARTIN FLETCHER, CHIEF IRELAND CORRESPONDENT

MO MOWLAM, the Northern Ireland Secretary, held her first face-to-face meeting yesterday with a Sinn Fein delegation that included the MPs Gerry Adams and Martin McGuinness and a convicted IRA gunrunner.

Dr Mowlam apologised if the meeting at Stormont Castle angered victims of the IRA. but insisted that bringing Sinn Fein into talks was the only way to prevent further violence and killings.

The gunrunner, Martin Ferris, served ten years in prison for attempting to smuggle seven tons of arms into Ireland. Dr Mowlam said imposing conditions on whom she met would merely mean months of further delay before peace talks could begin. The 212-hour meeting, made possible by the new IRA ceasefire. was the first between British ministers and Sinn Fein since January 1996, one month before the collapse of the previous ceasefire. Both sides emerged speaking cordially of the other. Dr Mowlam called Mr Adams a "strong, competent leader" and said she felt more confident about Sinn Fein's commitment to peace. Mr Adams acknowledged this "was not the same type of meetings we had with the last government" and welcomed Dr Mowlam as Northern Ireland's first woman Secretary of State. "We also want her to be the last Secretary of State," he added. Mr Adams, the Sinn Fein president, used the meeting to emphasise that Sinn Fein's first demand in the multiparty talks scheduled to resume on September 15 would be an united Ireland. "An internal six-county arrangement cannot work. There has to be fundamental constitutional and political change. The status quo is unworkable, he told Dr Mowlam.

However, Mr Adams hinted that Sinn Fein might accept some transitional arrangement, telling reporters that "in the meantime" there had to be Tas many improvements in the situation as possible. Those tion and harassment; demilitarisation; and the release of all "political" prisoners.

The meeting made no discernible progress towards resolving the two main obstacles to Unionist participation in the negotiations. Mr Adams insisted that IRA disarmament could only take place in the context of Northern Ire land's "total demilitarisation" and refused to accept the principle of consent if it was limited to Northern Ireland and gave the Province's Unionist majority a veto.

For Sinn Fein, yesterday's meeting was of great symbolic importance. Mr Adams and his five colleagues fully exploited the opportunity, walking the last 100 yards to the gates for the benefit of the many television cameras and holding a lengthy press conference afterwards. However, Dr Mowlam and her political affairs minister, Paul Murphy, greeted Mr Adams be-hind closed doors.

Events elsewhere in Northern Irland yesterday underscored the fragility of the present peace. A hoax bomb was sent to the loyalist Progressive Unionist Party. The Loyalist Volunteer Force, a paramilitary splinter group. attacked a Roman Catholic taxi driver in Craigavon.

Seventies singer Dana in bid for Irish presidency

By Audrey Magee, freland correspondent

DANA, the 1970 Irish Eurovision Song Contest winner, yesterday declared that she would stand for election as Irish president.

The singer, whose real name is Rosemary Brown, said it would be an honour to serve the Irish people and she would willingly give up her career in entertainment to contest the October poll. Dana, 44, who lives in Alabama, is staunchly anti-abortion and hosts a chat show on Mother Angelica, a US Catholic cable television channel.

She told Irish radio: "This is not an ego trip. This is not for security. I really would love to be able to give back something to the people of Ireland for all they have given me."

Dana, who would need the support of 20 Irish MPs to secure a nomination, said it remained to be seen whether she would get the necessary backing. She decided to run after consulting her husband and four children, who were very excited" by the move.

Dana, who was born in Londonderry and won the song contest with All Kinds of Everything, said she would reconsider her decision if John Hume, the SDLP leader, sought to succeed the incumbent, Mary Robinson. Mrs Robinson is standing down on September 12 to become the United Nations commissioner for human rights.

Mr Hume, also from Londonderry, has been asked by the main Irish political parties to stand for the position. He is the bookies' favourite for the job but said he had not decided whether he would accept the nomination. In a statement, he said that he was too preoccupied with the allparty talks to consider the matter. The presidential election date has been fixed for October 30, with nominations to be lodged by October 1.

Hilary Wainwright, the Editor of the left-wing magazine Red Pepper, last night accused the Government of "arrogant centralised control and the disastrously conservative economics of the workhouse".

The magazine's advisers include the MP Jeremy Corbyne the writer Ruth Rendell, who has been made a Labour working peer, and the MEP Hugh Kerr. Appraising the Government's 100 days in power, Ms Wainwright said that its "determinedly neo-liberal economics" would produce unrest and active protest. "Home Secretary Jack Straws zero tolerance represents the criminalisation of anti-social behaviour, the policing of the social disorder caused in new Labour's economic policy."

Mr Field, speaking to The Times last night, said he was critical of the fact that benefit office staff in Exeter, where the hudget was £170 million, were not free to control it.

"I want to know if it is feasible for them to manage it their way. Without interference from the DSS, which has 500 offices to look after. They could take maybe up to within the life of a Parliament. It could go to schools or hospitals: Whatever they think will help to break the dependency culture."

Under Mr Field's proposals, cash bonuses are to be offered to social security staff who help the Government in reforming the welfare bill. Incentive payments will vary depending on the savings achieved. To encourage the staff Mr Field will follow his visit to Exeter, where he spent three days, with a fact-finding tour of the benefit office in his Birkenhead constituency. Among some of the anomalies Mr Field has already identified is a presumption that prosecuted for sums less than 1500. He said: "We can't have people breaking the law."

Woman motorist goes distance with Eubank

CHRIS EUBANK, the former world champion boxer, met his match in the shape of an angry woman who slapped him across the face after their cars almost collided in a busy street in Brighton.

Years of tough training appears to have left Eubank, an egocentric whose pomp both delights and irritates boxing audiences, ill-prepared for the verbal and physical onslaught he suffered during the furious row in his home town.

Witnesses described how Eubank, 30, who formerly held the World Boxing Organisation's middle and supermiddleweight titles, simply stood in the middle of the street as the middle-aged woman set about him.

Eubank, who dresses as a monocled dandy and recently admined "I want to be liked". seems to have been the innocent party after the woman pulled out in front of his Jeep. Alan Smith, 37, who witnessed the altercation earlier this week, said: "It was all quite unnecessary. She obvi-ously doesn't like Eubank, but he was not doing anything

Death Row killer wins case review

BY RICHARD FORD

A MAN who murdered a four-year-old child on the tiny Caribbean island of St Vincent has won his light to have British judges review his conviction after a court in the West ladies ruled that UK laws protecting suspects operate there.

Eversley Thompson, who faces the death penalty, has appealed to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in London, and claims his confessions had been beaten out of him and that he had been denied access to legal advice. His victory in the East Caribbean Appeal Court could have far-reaching implications for any island in the West Indies which has based its own laws regarding evidence in court cases on an English model. It could mean that the protections provided for suspects in the UK, including how people are questioned and how investigations are con-ducted, operate in a number of Caribbean islands.

Long-range forecast looks to next century

THE prospect of four-year weather forecasts has moved a step closer with the discovery by British scientists of a vast temperature cycle in the North Atlantic. Researchers believe that the cycle, which has been found to operate over 12 to 14 years, may be playing a key role in shaping the climate over western Europe several years into the future. Rowan Sutton and Myles

Allen of the atmospheric occanic and planetary physics department of Oxford University believe the cycle might be used to forecast the weather up to four years ahead. Dr Sutton said yesterday that the forecasts would be less precise than the ones currently broadcast, but could indicate that the winter in 2001 was likely to be warmer or wetter and the spring, colder and drier than

"Although they will never be detailed, they nevertheless could be quite useful for certain sectors, such as the reinsurance industry," Dr Sutton said in Nature. Other areas that could benefit from a role in driving weather

BY NICK NUTTALL ENVIRONMENT CORRESPONDENT long-term weather forecasts are the clothing industry. where manufacturers could plan to make more woollens in anticipation of colder winters and springs; farmers planning crops; water companies managing resources and power generation companies who could plan the shutdown of plant for maintenance several years in advance based on the forecast that a warmer winter will mean less demand.

Even holidaymakers or those planning a wedding could benefit. A forecast of a colder, wetter, spring might prompt some people to switch their wedding and outdoor reception into the summer.

The possibilities have emerged from a study of surface sea temperature in the North Atlantic between the 1940s and 1980s where the researchers have found the 10 to 14-year pattern linked with the Gulf Stream. These changes make some parts of the Atlantic colder and other parts warmer than usual. Temperature differences in the oceans are thought to play systems because of changes in atures such as evaporation Dr Sutton said they believed that the cycle they have discovered could affect a key weather and storm-forming region off Florida which in turn drives winds, storms, airstreams and clouds across to Britain and western Europe.

We believe that the temperature of the ocean in that region could have a particularly important influence on the weather systems and, downstream, perhaps an important effect on Europe. We. are talking about relatively small changes in the ocean temperatures but these sit around, influencing climate patterns, for a long time," Dr Sutton said.

D British birds are laying their eggs earlier, sported on by global changes that hasten the arrival of spring. A study reported in Nature by the British Trust for Ornithology of 65 species of bird shows that in 20 of them, egg-laying has advanced by an average of 8.8. days since 1971.

with one in five in 1991. report's authors, said: The increase in the age of marriage, even though premarital cohabitation is greater, could be one of the reasons why adult men are living with their parents. The increased age of. child birth and the number of people staying in full-time education are other factors." The report, by the Office for National Statistics, is the most wide-ranging official study of families and has found that the number of first-time marriages in Britain has halved and the number of divorces has trebled in a generation. Although fewer than half of us now live in a traditional household of parents with children, those who leave home keep in close touch with relatives and 83 per cent expect to have Christmas dinner with them. Only 3 per cent of divorced fathers lose touch with their children. Mr Norman says: "Despite the changing economic and social characteristics of families in recent years, the family

In just 25 years the proportion of these has trebled and now accounts for almost a quarter of all households with children. The number of children born outside marriage accounts for a third of all births - four times the proportion in 1971. While the number of first marriages is decreasing, 68 per cent of couples live togeth-201,000 couples married for the first time — just over half the peak number in 1970. Although around 40 per cent of these marriages are likely to end in divorce, there are signs that the trend of splitting up is beginning to level out. ☐ Social Focus on Families.

Alarms keep of nets, say researchers

ACOUSTIC alarms fixed to some types of fishing net have porpoises and dolphins, scientists have said.

Researchers studied bottomset gill nets which are linked with the death of tens of thousands of porpoises and dolphins across the globe. About 2,000 harbour porpoises are killed every year in the Celtic Sea by these kinds of nets. say experts.

The new studies, made off New Hampshire, indicate that alarms which emit pulses of sound - pingers - may be the answer, according to reports of a team of American scientists in the journal Nature. Just two porpoises became caught in ners with acoustic alarms compared with 25 in those without.

Small league clubs are being forced to the wall as Premiership sides pay ever higher prices for foreign players, Fraser Nelson reports

MANCHESTER UNITED has become the largest foorball club in Europe, reaching the top of an industry transformed by a financial revolution that will force many smaller clubs to insolvency, an independent report said

Spiralling players' wages, over-ambitious plans to build stadiums unlikely to be filled and a flow of overseas signings which leaves British supporters bankrolling Italian football are detailed by the accountants Deloitte Touche.

In its annual review, regarded as the most authoritative report on the industry. it puts Manchester United at the top of Europe with turnover of £53.3 million for 1994-95, the latest data available. Only seven of the 92 clubs in the English league made a profit of £1 million or more.

The report forecasts that Premiership players are likely to be paid an average £310,000 this season as wages rise faster than ever. Since the £20 ceiling on player's fees was abolished in 1961 after pressure from Jimmy Hill. the increase has been left to market forces. Players in the top English division have enjoyed 25 per cent increases pushing the Premiership's annual wage bill over £150

The report found that in the 1995-96 season British foot-bali made a loss of £98 million after £93 million was drained from the country by the rush to buy overseas players. That, it says, is creating a bizarre situation where the seasonticket money from British supporters can end up being channelled into the cost of Inter Milan's purchase of the Brazilian star Ronaldo.

The demand for big-name overseas players saw Fabrizio Ravanelli recruited to Middlesbrough for a reported £42,000 a week before the club was relegated to the First Division. A transfer deal to Division. A transfer deal to Everton reportedly fell through because his wage

Gerry Boon, a senior part-ner at Deloitte Touche, said:

"We don't have exact figures for how much is going into overseas clubs but you can bet that a fair slug of Italian football is being paid for by the British this season."

The report concluded that clubs should trim their expenditure plans to match their size, not their ambitions. Part of the problem was identified. as serial stadium building. where small clubs borrow to build huge stadiums they have little chance of filling. Mr Boon said: "This is a real worry for a lot of clubs. They ask for 25,000-seater stadiums without asking how many times they have had 25,000 crowds. The only way they would fill it is for championship matches, and these come once in a blue

He said football was showing that it was willing to take ever-greater financial risks but that would send far more clubs to the wall. "What put the clubs in difficulty is that they constantly spend more than they earn. Previously they have balanced the books by selling a player or finding a local person willing to buy the club for emotional reasons and suffer the losses.

The Bosman decision has shattered the certainty of selling a player and the losses of the smaller clubs are getting so deep that they will have difficulty finding a local supporter with pockets deep enough to manage it."

Manchester United's wage bill of £13.3 million in 1995-96 was less than half of AC Milan's £31.4 million, the highest in Europe. Mr Boon said: "Manchester United is top in the world in terms of income, profitability and probably in terms of controlling their wage bill. It has structured its business and developed its brand so that pusiness success is not entiredependent upon on-thefield success."

He contrasted that with Newcastle United, the league runners-up, who made the biggest loss, with a deficit of £23.6 million. "When Eric Cantona announced his retirement, United's share price fell by just 1 per cent," Mr Boon said. "But when Alan Shearer was badly injured recently Newcastle's share price plummeted 6 or 7 per cent," he said.

Mr Boon said the new deal between the Premiership and BSkyB would accentuate the divide. The average Premiership club could expect television revenue of £5.5 million this season while the best that those outside could hope for was about £1 million.

THE number of people arrested at football matches fell by more than a third over the past four seasons, although the decline now seems to have levelled out. Arrests in or around soccer club grounds remained steady at 4,400 last season, the figures from the National Criminal Intelligence Service show.

A breakdown of the figures between the 1992-93 season and 1996-97 also discloses that while arrests at first and third division clubs have halved, arrests at FA Carling Premiership clubs have remained the same. There were 961 arrests outside Premiership club grounds, 456 outside first division grounds, 265 outside second and 169 outside third division grounds.

Detective Superintendent Bryan Drew said the drop in arrests was achieved by close co-operation between the service and police officers. "The majority of serious offences are the work of organised hooliganism." he said.

Developing good-quality intelligence remains the key to stilling attempts to cause trouble."

The number of soccerrelated arrests in 1992-93 was 6.327 compared with 4,400 last season. With attendance over the same period up from 24.5 million to more than 26 million, the number of arrests per 100,000 spectators fell from 25.8 to 16.7. Drink-related offences formed the largest category of offences in 1996-1997.

Mozart and Beethoven: their style is emulated

Composers give encores by computer

MOZART, Beethoven and Delius are composing again, courtesy of a computer which, t is claimed, can create works in the style of the great composers.

The computer program, called Experiments in Musical Intelligence, has had a symphony, entitled Mozart's 42nd Symphony, performed by a college orchestra at the University of Santa Cruz, California. Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, who died in 1791, wrote 41 symphonies. The program has also produced works in the style of Brahms, Chopin, Rachma-ninov and Scott Joplin.

In the space of three months it also churned out 5,000 "original" works, including 1,500 symphonies, 2,000 piano sonatas and 1,500 miscellaneous pieces.

The program is the brainchild of the composer and computer expert David Cope, who is based at the Santa Cruz university. He originally devised it to help him to overcome his composer's

It is based on the principle of "musical dice games" once employed by some 18th century composers. Beginning with fragments of music, they would write new works by arranging the fragments according to dice throws. In the same way, the computer takes pieces of music, breaks them up into tiny bits and reassembles them. To avoid producing gibberish, it applies an understanding of the grammar and symax of music. The distinctive sound of a particular composer is captured using a "pattern matcher". Examples of the composer's music are sifted for characteristic sequences. These "signatures" are dropped into the composition at just the points where the real composer would have used them.

Not all experts are delighted by the arrival of the electronic composer. Douglas Hofstadter, a cognitive scientist at the University of Indiana who studies computer creativity and who is a pianist, told New Scientist: The program has no model whatsoever of life experiences, has no sense of itself. has no sense of Chopin, has never heard a note of music, has not a trace in it of where I think music comes from. "I'm comparing that with an entire human soul, one forged by the struggles and travails of life ... and all the experiences that create emotion, turmoil, despair, resignation; everything you want to think of that goes into building a character." Nevertheless, Dr Hofstadter admitted to being stunned when he played a Chopin mazurka written by the program. "It sounded, except for a few glitches, as if it could slide right into the book of Chopin mazurkas." he said. Critics have said that the works, while impressive, sound like the efforts of lesser composers trying to emulate the work of the great masters. However, comparing its music to that of Mozart's contemporary and rival, Antonio Salieri, Dr Cope told New Scientist: "This music is better than that."

Stewart Tendler harks back to the bad old days of stook-buzzers and Rodneys, if the "stook-buzzers" did not steal the handkerchief from your pocket, and the "thimblescrewers" did not whip away your watch, the "swell mob" might clean out your pockets. Strolling with a snack in hand was an invitation to a "pudding stammer" to pounce.

The journalist Henry Mayhew's colourful classification of the London underworld in his 1861 chronicles shocked his Victorian readers. As the great reformers laid the foundations of today's criminal justice system with modern police forces, new prisons, law reforms and the first crime statistics, a vivid underworld flourished in the new industrial cities.

Dickens and a friendly police inspector penetrated the heart of a London rookery, or criminal quarter, to watch young thieves at their leisure over supper in "Rat's Castle". Angus Reach of the Morning Chronicle visited a Manchester lodging house and saw by the light of a Rickering lamp a pickpocket with "little deep-sunk eyes and square boney jaws, with a vile expression". The women. Reach recalled, were "coarse-looking and repulsive", the men "squalid, hulking fellows with no particular mark of any trade or calling on them".

It was newspaper copy calculated to thrill and chill the burgeoning middle classes of mid-Victorian Britain. Memories were fresh of the "hungry Forties", when unemployment reached the highest level of the century and men were so desperate that they stole to get themselves transported. Revolution stalked Europe and the Chartists

As the country began to climb to sunnier uplands, the spectre of the "dangerous class" remained. In the 1860s, The Times warned of a criminal class "more alien from the rest of the community than a hostile army". They worked from "flash houses, or havens, in the great

In the countryside the "Wolds rangers" roamed the East Riding and the "Rodneys" of south Staf-fordshire lived by robbery. During the summer they might be joined by members of the "swell mob", the cream of the London pickpockets who left the capital for the criminal equivalent of the Grand Tour. They followed the great fairs and race meetings raound the country and were known to travel to the Continent and New York in search or could the new police be totally reliable. The Chief Constable of Staffordshire accused his men of taking bribes from lawyers looking for work. The old saying, If you want to know the time ask a policeman", comes from the days when the police were suspected of taking timepieces from drunks. In 1855, PC Jesse "Juicy Lips" Jeapes was dismissed by Scotland Yard on suspicion of taking cash from pickpockets. Some of his colleagues were known to stand aside from fights in case they were beaten too.

When the "garrotting" scare struck London in 1862, the police found themselves under new pressure. The Victorian version of today's Rolex raiders and muggers seized their victims from behind in

The two suspects held for the attack were "ticket of leave" men, convicts released early on the promise of good behaviour. Their arrest was taken as evidence of the dangers of liberality in a long-running battle in the late 19th century between liberal reformers and the law and order lobby.

They could count on support from hyperbolic magazines such as the Illustrated Police News, which carried garish engravings recon-structing terrible deeds. They were rarely short of copy: mad and masochistic Dr Thomas Cream murdered prostitutes with poison; surburban London trembled at Kate Webster, the Irish cook who killed her mistress in her Surrey home and then boiled the body. ## Serial widow kept death in the family

ary Ann Cotton was the Victorian era's most prolific murderer, poisoning three husbands and more than a dozen children. She killed so many that historians are unsure of the tally: 16 or 21. The motive was often insurance payouts.

People were appalled and she became a bogey-woman as news of the "West Auckland Case" spread in the 1870s. It had everything to chill the Victorian heart and fill the Illustrated Police News. After her execution in 1873 children in the North East would chant:

Mary Ann Cotton She's dead and she's rotten She lies in her bed With her eyes wide open

Sing, sing, oh. what can I Mary Ann Cotton is tied up wi' string Where, where? Up in the air Cotton was born in 1832 and brought up in a Co Durham pit village. At 20 she married a navvy. William Mowbray. Her first victims included some of their eight children and in 1865 her husband suffered a bout of diarrhoea so violent that he died in hours. He had taken out insurance

Next she became housekeeper for John Robinson, a shipwright, and his five children. then married him. Four of the stepchildren died from "gastric fever" and Mary Ann disappeared after robbing their father.

Never one to let bigarny stand in her way, she married a pitman. Frederick Cotton, in Newcastle in 1870. A few from "gastric fever". A year after the marriage, Frederick was also gone, then his tenyear-old son and the couple's baby son was struck down. Joseph Nastrass moved in as a lodger-lover. There was another fever and another death; he left Cotton E10. By July 1872 the only survivor of her latest marriage was her stepson Charles Edward. Locals in West Auckland, where they lived, knew she had taken up with an excise man. She was pregnant and there was talk of marriage. She tried in vain to dump Charles on an uncle.

Six days after saying that the boy was an impediment to her marriage plans, he died and suspicions were roused. At first the death was put down to gastric illness, but a doctor analysed the child's remains and found traces of arsenic. Cotton was arrested with her new baby. At first she said that she had bought arsenic to kill bugs. Later she blamed the death on fumes from the wallpaper dye. She was convicted in March 1873 of killing the boy, and executed at Durham jail by the septuagenarian hangman Calcraft. She never confessed.

Ripper farce failed to amuse Victoria

AS Jack the Ripper's bloody ens, who treated the team to deeds shocked London in 1888. the public wanted to know why the killer was still at large So did Victoria. A. message from Windsor Castle to Scotland Yard said: "The Queen fears that the detective force department is not as efficient as it might be."

From the early days of the new police in 1829, emphasis had been placed on uniformed officers preserving public tranquility and preventing crime. Detection was added to the general instructions almost as an afterthought. Amid public fears that the police would become an instrument of state repression, politicians were cautious about plainclothes officers.

By 1842 attitudes had changed after a series of London murders and the disbanding of the Bow Street Runners. A force of eight detectives was appointed at the Yard with the support of campaigners including Dick-

Words. There was little to fete. Forensic science relied on photography and plaster casts of footprints. In 1857 Major General Willam Cartwright, the first inspector of constabu-lary, questioned letting the public buy Police Gazette, which circulated details of wanted criminals to all forces. In 1877 three of the four chief inspectors in the detective branch were jailed for corruption after falling into the clutches of two fraudsters running bogus betting establishments. In the aftermath. the force was reorganised. Reformers looked at the French Surete and created the forerunner of today's CID. Candidates had to be welleducated and of "good standing", preferably with a military background or a language. The Yard rapidly found there was no substitute

Students in gap trap can sue for fees, says lawyer

Those who deferred university entry may be able to claim exemption from charges, reports David Charter

STUDENTS unable to reverse plans for a gap year" will be able to bring a legal case against the Government to claim exemption from the first university course fees in 1998, a leading education lawyer said yesterday.

Jack Rabinowicz said the Government would inevitably face a challenge if students who deferred starting at university before its announcement on fees were unable to switch back.

Thousands of teenagers who originally applied to put off their university place are expected to join the scramble to begin studies this year to avoid the scrapping of grants and introduction of annual £1.000 fees next year. But many will be caught in the socalled "gap trap", shut out from university this October because their courses are already full.

The deadline for university applications was December 15, seven months before the Government's response to Sir Ron Dearing's report on higher education. Details of a new loan system have yet to be announced and students starting university from 1998 face average debts of £12,000 at graduation. Fees will not be charged in 1998 for students who start this year, which Mr Rabinowicz, a member of the Education Law Association, claims

Dearing his reforms face court challenge who applied for deferred entry. Around 19,000 are believed to hold offers conditional on A-level results, which come out next Thursday.

These students would have a reasonable argument because of the concept of legitimate expectation that a public body would act in a certain way," Mr Rabinowicz said. "It is at least arguable, and possibly more than that, that there was an entitlement to resist fees." However, a spokesman for the Department for Education and Employment said the

the university was separate from the funding arrangement with the Government. He added: The fees regime starts in 1998, so students must make the judgment about whether deterring is more important than the fees. There are issues on which some nettles have to be grasped and now is the time for grasping

Mr Rabinowicz described this statement as "extremely glib". He added: "If the arrangements have already been agreed with the university, you cannot necessarily backtrack. If the Government is not prepared to accommo-date these students, there will inevitably be litigation.

Organisations which run gap-year activities are worried that fees will put youngsters off. Levinia Bristol, director of Project Trust, which sends teenagers into year-long voluntary work placements in schools, farms and communities around the world, said the gap-year concept was under threat.

Things are stacking up against people taking a year under the last Government about the desirability of volunteering, but one does not see much evidence of people taking this seriously. We would be very disappointed if this put people off taking a year out."

Baby ostriches need to be led on runs, preferably by someone who doesn't mind impersonating their father

Brood pursues a father on the run

By A STAFF REPORTER

BABYSITTING a brood of newly hatched ostriches involves rather more than making sure they go to bed on time. It demands skills more in the line of being able to run at 20mph without stepping on any of the eight-inch high balls of fluff careering around your ankles. It also helps if you can flap vour arms like Wi the same time.

In the wild, as soon as chicks are hatched, the father runs off at top speed — followed by his hrood. But unless Malvern Hills Children's Zoo can find two volunteers willing to impersonate a male ostrich for two hours a day, the four baby ostriches are unlikely to develop the leg muscles they need, and might even have to be put down. Christopher Cox, who owns the 200 in Welland, Worcestershire, and is the present surrogate parent, said the brood was born later than usual and he needed the babysitters or haby runners — because staff did not have time.

"He or she would have to be

stop running, the ostriches sit down," he said. "A top athlete like Linford Christie would be ideal but any fit individual who is patient and who doesn't mind flapping their arms like a bird would be great.

The chicks think you're their father. They have good eyesight, but they are not very clever.

Blunkett seeks to tackle heads shortage

By David Charter EDUCATION CORRESPONDENT

THE Government is seeking increased pay for senior primary school staff to avert an impending shortage of head teachers. David Blunkett will ask the independent teachers' pay body to even up salary difference between primary and secondary schools. The Education Secretary told the School Teachers' Review Body yesterday to create a grade of Advanced Skills Teacher, with higher pay, to reward those who stay in the classroom rather than seeking a management role, as promised in Labour's election manifesto. He is also seeking to tackle long-standing problems schools in bringing men into the profession and retaining senior staff. Primaries are receiving fewer applications for headships and the number of schools re-advertising posts is rising, according to surveys for The Times Educational Supplement.

Head teachers' pay is closely linked to the numbers of pupils in their school, with the largest primary school paying £33,000 compared with £56,000 at big secondary schools. The Government's pledge to limit infant class sizes to 30 would restrict primary head teachers' pay under this system.

Mr Blunkett intends that the Advanced Skills Teachers would help to spread best practice among new teachers. The current classroom pay limit is £21,318.

"We need to ensure that those who are in the service for 20 to 30 years have a career structure, have hope of improvement without having to go into management and administrative posts. If you are keeping the best in the classroom, if they are sharing their skills with others, then you're achieving the goals we have set out," Mr Blunkett told BBC Radio 4's Today programme.

Of the extra £835 million for schools allocated in the Budget. £330 million is expected to go towards next year's teachers' pay award. Teachers' unions reacted angrily to the "super teacher" plans, saying eacners snouid de ed with extra pay.

Doug McAvoy, general secretary of the National Union of Teachers, said: "I want teachers to be rewarded for the job they do and to be given financial recognition for the demands that are placed on them. That's something I want for all teachers."

The review body will make its recommendations on pay levels in time for the next pay round, in February.

Pakistan loses faith in democracy as dream turns sour

From Christopher Thomas in lahore

A THIRD of Pakistanis, sick of corrupt politicians and de-crepit democracy, favour a return to dictatorship: a startling finding as the country prepares for its 50th birthday next week. The "impossible dream" of Pakistan, realised by Muhammad Ali Jinnah. remains for millions today an unfulfilled promise.

The Islamic state - Jinnah never wanted it to become one. but that betrayal of the father of the nation is glossed over — is in a deep crisis that can only be described in superlarives. so dire are its problems. The country's very survival is at stake as Nawaz Sharif, the Prime Minister, holds in his grasp the power to destroy or save what is left of public faith in elected government.

None of his towering promises in February's general election has been fulfilled. least of all the promise of clean government. His first administration, in power from 1990 to 1993 was the most corrupt the country has known, and nothing indicates that his new Government is any better. INDEPENDENCE

The mood on the streets is angry. Unprecedented food riots in April, when the provinces of North West Frontier. Sindh and Baluchistan ran short of wheat, were a reminder of how close Pakistan is to calamity. Islamic extremists have most to gain from this nationwide despair. Dictator-ships have failed, democracy is failing, and there seems nowhere to turn: fertile ground for the religious Right, although it is enfeebled by divisions within its own ranks. "I am frightened of what will happen to Pakistan if Nawaz Sharif fails," Najam Sethi, Editor of the respected Friday Times. said. "Fifty years down the line, we stand of them the same people who a nation state and a political

Pakistan lacks India's sense of roots and identity. India assumed the history of the subcontinent in 1947, as well as the key institutions of government, banking and politics, leaving the new na-tion with nothing but the army - still the ultimate power - to hold it together. It even started life without a currency: legions of workers rubber-stamped mountains of Indian banknotes with the word "Pakistan" until the new nation was

There have been five periods of full or partial martial law, lasting 18 years, six abortive military coups and three periods under states of emergency. Only one president has completed his term. prime ministers have been

Partition in 1947 was victory for Islamic nationalism, a tragedy for India, and neither country observes the anniversary next week with any real sense of celebration: India because independence was coupled with amoutation, Pakistan because so many dreams are unfulfilled. ## Futile mountain conflict as neighbours fight over glacier

IN PAKISTAN-CONTROLLED SIACHEN

THE silence of the snow-covered mountain peaks is broken by the thunder of intermittent artillery fire. At 20.000ft, even in summer, the temperature is between -20C and -30C. and normal breathing can be difficult. The troops of Pakistan and India continue to fight one of the world's toughest battles.

The two countries' forces exchange more than 800 rounds of artillery fire every day to try to consolidate their positions on the Siachen Glacier. the casualties are caused by the harsh vegetation. The cost of war in human lives and financial resources is exorbitant but neither bitter rival is ready to give up its claim over a terrain which has little strategic value.

By MICHAEL BINYON DIPLOMATIC EDITOR

TWO of the signatories of the Dayton peace accord agreed vesterday that the return of Bosnian refugees to their homes would be slower than they hoped, but reaffirmed the right of all to go back.

President Tudjman of Croatia and President Izetbegovic of Bosnia met in Split to coordinate their positions before the arrival of Richard Holbrooke, the American convenor of the Dayton summit. Mr Holbrooke arrived in the Adriatic resort yesterday to warn the Balkan leaders that the West was losing patience.

In a joint statement signed after their meeting the two leaders promised further cooperation on the peace plan. Their meeting came only a few days after drunken rioting and intimidation by Crosts prevented about 500 Muslim refugees from returning to their houses in Jajce. Both men have also been warned by European ministers that they face sanctions if they continue to flout the Dayton accord. Mr Izetbegovic tried to downplay the failure by all three ethnic groups to over-come their difference by saving: "We had overestimated the possibility of implementing something like the return of refugees."

Cape Town enlists Sexy Boys and | France sees danger The Firm in bid for 2004 Olympics

FROM R.W. JOHNSON IN CAPE TOWN

THE Olympics will create jobs; we support the Olympics." says Rashied Staggie. joining in the general hype aimed at attracting the 2004 Olympic Games to Cape Mr Staggie is not just another municipal politician plugging his city's bid: he is the head of one of Cape Town's toughest criminal gangs, the Hard Livings, and is believed to control the cocaine trade in the whole Western Cape region. Mr Staggie's testimony is just one more sign of how desperately hard South Africa is trying to attract the Olympics to Cape Town. Even in the rival cities of Johannesburg and Durban there are posters saying: "If Cape Town wins, we all win." Indeed, the whole country has entered into the emotional struggle to mount Africa's first Olympics.

There are many problems about Cape Town's bid. Realistically. South Africa's en-trant should have been Durban, which has a far better climate during the Olympic months, more hotel rooms and better sports facilities. But Cape Town is South Africa's mother city in much the same way that Boston is America's and that always made it an emotionally more plausible bidder. It is one of the world's most beautiful cities, but the climate in June-December is cold, windy and wet. The city has only 400 registered taxis, only 1.200 buses, which are used mainly by the poor and the foolhardy. and a rail network that many are scared to travel on. The city's Olympic Bid

Committee estimates that up to 300,000 people would visit the city every day in Olympic year and yet the city has only 18,000 hotel beds. More worrying still, in the last week of the 1996 Olympics 600.000 people a day poured through Atlanta airport and even patriotic locals doubt the ability of Cape Town airport to handle a tenth of that number.

South Africa is suffering a national neurosis over the bid for other reasons, though. First, South Africa is deeply conscious of the isolation inflicted on the country by the apartheid period and Cape Town's ability to capture the Olympics has become a question of whether the country can successfully reintegrate itself into the world beyond.

Moreover, Cape Town has secome South Africa's most fashionable city, home to Earl Spencer. Diana, Princess of Wales's brother, and international celebrities. A flight of upper-income whites from Jonamnesburg towards Cape Town is in progress, so that if Cape Town is not adjudged good enough for the Olympics, South Africa as a whole will feel that it has been found wanting. Most of all. South Africa worries that its crime wave is driving away foreign investment and tourism. Hence the appearance of the strange figure of Mr Staggie. Cape Town has the highest incidence of rape in the world and the second-highest murder rate after Johannesburg. Moreover, the Cape Flats have long been plagued by gang warfare on an infamous scale. Apart from the Hard Livings, there are the Sexy Boys, the Americans, the Scorpions and The Firm. ## of fundamentalism in Comoros revolt

FROM BEN MACINTYRE IN PARIS

FRENCH politicians warned yesterday that growing demands for a resumption of French rule over the Comoros islands in the Indian ocean could destabilise the entire region and play into the hands of Islamic fundamentalists. With the secessionist revolt spreading from Anjouanto Moheli, two of the four islands that make up the Comoran archipelago, what began as an odd, even flattering anachronism is fast turning into an embarrassing crisis for France. The islands declared independence in 1975, with the exception of Mayotte which voted by referendum to remain French.

Envious of the comparative prosperity of Mayotte, pro-French secessionists on Anjouan last Sunday declared their independence from the Comoros Islamic Federal Republic and appointed a provisional government. Riot police yesterday clashed with demonstrators on the smaller island of Moheli, after they raised the French tricolour over government buildings:

The separatists in Fomboni, the main town on Moheli, were reported to have hoisted the yellow-and-black flag of Queen Fatima Djoumbe, the last ruler of Moheli before

colonisation. France, which is seeking military disengagement from its former African colonies, has refused to heed the calls for a return to French rule, insisting the situation is a matter for the government in Moroni on Grande Cornore, the largest island.

Jacques Godfrain, a minister in France's previous conservative Government, warned that the situation should not be treated lightly. "Iran is among the countries bordering on the Indian Ocean, and the situation in an Islamic republic in the heart of the Indian Ocean must be followed with the closest attention," he said.

Noting that the three independent Comoros islands are "envious" of their French neighbour, M Godfrain said that maintaining levels of development in the three islands is essential to prevent feelings of inequality in comparison with Mayotte."

Meanwhile, the new leader in Anjouan, Abdullah Ibra-him, yesterday held the first meeting of his "cabinet" which ordered a check into the amount of money left in government coffers.

President Kim Young Sam of South Korea spoke of the "overflowing sorrow" of victims' relatives gathered at Seoul's Kimpo airport.

Distraught relatives in Seoul and Agana, the capital of Guam, protested over the confusion that surrounded the fate of passengers as the airline said it could not con-firm the exact number of survivors and could not release any names.

The protesters also complained that casualty figures which put the number of survivors at up to 50, raised false hopes.

neighbourhoods, into homes instead of hills and grass." As an 18-member investigative team from the National Transportation Safety Board arrived in Guam yesterday it emerged that in addition to being without a "glide slope indicator" to aid incoming aircraft, the international airport is the only one in the US certified to receive wide-bodied iets that uses contracted air traffic controllers, rather than Federal Aviation Administration employees.

By nightfall yesterday, after a 17-hour search, 69 bodies had been pulled from the charred scrub and saw grass on Nimitz Hill, three miles from the airport, where the plane skidded through undergrowth for hundreds of yards, rupturing a nearby fuel pipeline and disintegrating.

The last survivor was rescued aroung noon yesterday and the grim search for the bodies of more than 150 passengers still unaccounted for - many of them honeymooners and tourists from Korea was expected to resume at first light today.

Within minutes of the disaster, a tew passengers were stumbling from their seats through thick smoke. Hong Hyon Song, in a firstclass seat in Row 13, said he felt the plane's undercarriage go down and thought the flight had landed.

"I thought the plane was skidding off the runway to the grass near by." he said, "but when I looked out I saw trees rushing past the windows. Then suddenly there was a bang and the plane hit the ground.

"As I tried to get out of the plane in a hurry, fearing possible explosions, a lady pulled my foot. It was dark but I knew a lady was there. I pulled her arms and got out by clearing away the leaves around. I was worried the plane might explode."

Mr Hong told the Korea Broadcasting System that he returned to the wreckage to doctors on the scene, said at a shout for more survivors. "Children shouted for help," press conference. The girl was rescued unburt.

FEW saw Flight 801's final moments, but Carl Gutierrez, the Governor of Guam, was among the first on the scene. It was the start of a 22-hour ordeal that cast him by turns as the chief rescuer, consoler and spokesman for the stricken island.

"When we got there the wreckage was burning," he told NBC. "It was 2 am. The flame was melting the fuselage and I knew the people in the mid-section were not going to make it."

At first, the Governor said, he did not believe that there would be any survivors. "Then we heard screams of people crying for attention."

The Governor and some of his staff scrambled down a 45-degree slope and through thick jungle to a section of wreckage from the front of the plane. There he rescued five people, including a New Zealand helicopter me-chanic who was able to walk from his seat in row 19, said Ginger Cruz, his spokeswoman. Among the others were an injured flight attendant and an IIyear-old Japanese girl, Rika Matsuda. But he was unable to help the girl's mother. "She was dead in the flames." Mr Gutierrez said.

By HARVEY ELLIOTT AIR CORRESPONDENT

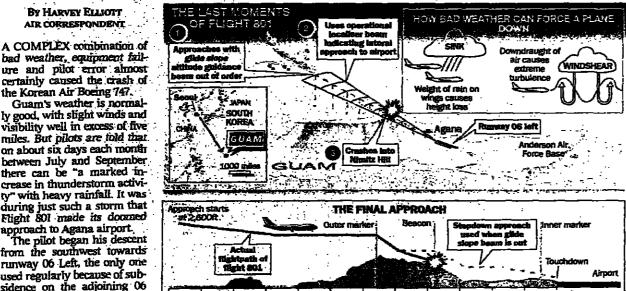

bad weather, equipment fail-ure and pilot error almost certainly caused the crash of the Korean Air Boeing 747. Guam's weather is normally good, with slight winds and visibility well in excess of five miles. But pilots are told that on about six days each month between July and September there can be "a marked increase in thunderstorm activity" with heavy rainfall. It was during just such a storm that Hight 801 made its doomed approach to Agana airport,

The pilot began his descent from the southwest towards runway 06 Left, the only one used regularly because of subsidence on the adjoining 06 Right. He knew from official notices that the equipment that should keep the aircraft at the right height and on the correct glide slope towards the airport was switched off for maintenance. That was not unusual and on official charts pilots are told the minimum visibility they must have to land when the equipment is out of order. For a big aircraft like the Boeing 747-300, which had been delivered to Korean Air by Boeing in December 1984 and had completed 8,433 landings, the minimum was a

With the glide slope equipment out of order, pilots have to follow a chart showing how. to descend using a step landing". But most airlines ban any attempt at landing at night when the glide slope beam is not working, however good the visibility.

The pilot could have diverted to the neighbouring well equipped USAF Andersen island of Salpan. But he chose to land as scheduled.

As he flew over the coast at about 3,000ft, the aircraft was engulfed in torrential rain. In such extreme tropical conditions aircraft can be hit by a phenomenon known as wind shear, a powerful downdraught of air that has a similar effect as water pouring from a tap then bouncing back up from the ground. In a split second the aircraft is first thrust upwards, then faces a . strong nose wind. Then a huge downward force slams it towards the ground, followed, if it survives, by a tail blast. The weight of the rain itself can also force aircraft below the proper altitude. The wings of a Boeing 747 are so huge that in extreme conditions the weight of rainwater is sufficient to push it downwards.

It is not yet known if one, or even both, of these meteorological conditions contributed to the crash. But what is known is that the aircraft was about 600ft lower than it should have been three miles from touchdown.

The peak to the southwest of Guam rises 1.190ft above the runway, but is slightly offset from the centreline. Official charts say that at that stage of the approach the aircraft must be at a minimum height of 1,608ft - about 500ft above the highest peak, which should be on the aircraft's right.

The pilot of Flight 801, however, had veered slightly off course so that he was a few hundred yards to the right of the centreline of the runway.

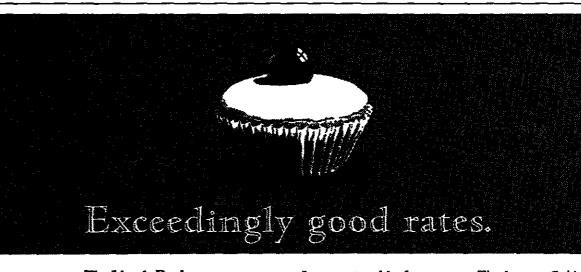

Investigators want to establish whether he was pushed out of alignment by the weather, why he carried on towards a landing in such conditions with vital equipment out of order and if he knew exactly where he was. As the jet flew over a marker.

four miles from the runway the pilot would have heard a bleep indicating that he was now on the final descent. Seconds later ~ 1.6 miles nearer the airport - he would have received a visual warning that he had passed over the main beacon.

At that point he was able to descend below 1,184ft and make the final approach to the runway. Did he begin the descent a mile too soon?

The plane's distance-measuring equipment should have plotted its position in relation to the runway, his co-pilot should have been reading the charts and calling out the minimum height that he should have been maintaining. The landing gear was down and the landing lights were on.

They would have been on the ground within two minutes. Instead they hit the hillside at about 160mph.

Added to political stalemate on tax and other reforms, an eight-year record low of the mark against the dollar and signs that the east German economy is not recovering quickly enough, yesterday's jubless figures highlighted the difficulties of the Chancellor as he struggles to meet European economic and monetary union targets.

Pressure is increasing on the Bundesbank to raise interest rates: analysts say that a rate of DM 1.90 to the dollar is the critical moment and the rate reached DM LS8 this week. Pressure is also increasing on the Government to show that the flickering signs of economic recovery, largely led by exporters, will translate into more jobs.

The authorities blamed the rise largely on early summer holidays and pre-holiday layoffs: the seasonally adjusted figure was closer to 17,000 job losses. ## City hopes another rate rise will be avoided

By MICHAEL CLARK STOCK MARKET CORRESPONDENT

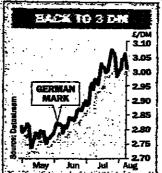

CITY investors are keeping their fingers crossed that another rise in interest rates today can be avoided. Yesterday they went on a huge spending spree that sent share prices soaring to their highest levels. At the same time, the pound lost ground from recent highs against the dollar and the mark.

Sterling's trade-weighted index fell a steep.

The pound turned round from its recent peaks in the belief by dealers that the Bank of England's Monetary Policy Committee may choose to leave interest rates unchanged after its two-day meeting that concludes at lunchtime today.

Share prices, meanwhile, were supported by sharp opening gains on Wall Street and a record 5,026.2. By contrast, the FTSE 250 rose just 18.7 to 4,517.3, confirming that once again demand was focused almost entirely on blue chips. In the past 12 months, the market has grown 31 per cent, with strong demand for domestic earners such as the banks. Yesterday's slide in the pound relocused support on cyclical issues such as engineers and exporters.

It is believed that Eddie George, the anxious to damp down the economy, which has seen spending in the shops start to race away on the back of building society windfall payments totalling 529 billion. But some economists have expressed fears that further rises in interest rates could undermine the economy by sending it sliding back into recession Richard Jeffrey, chief economist at Charterhouse, the merchant bank, is concerned about the stock market's recent dramatic rise. The market is very vulnerable. It is being driven higher by rising liquidity levels and not by improving fundamentals. It will be difficult to sustain the rest of this year with interest rates pushing progressively higher," he said.

The pound's weakness was also good news for government securities, where prices grew by about $4 at the longer end.

Pru raises pensions provision to £450m

PRUDENTIAL has raised its provision for paying compensation for pensions misselling, from £240 million to £450 million, in an effort to hasten the review.

and others in the insurance industry have come under pressure from the Government to sort out what has been dubbed the greatest financial scandal of the century.

The fiasco involved encouraging thousands of people to opt out of company schemes in favour of personal pensions.

Royal & SunAlliance faces disciplinary action after allegedly missing a deadline for compensating customers sold the wrong pensions (Adam Jones writes). The insurer was supposed to sort out 90 per cent of its most pressing cases by the end of July, but yesterday the Personal Investment Anthority, the City regu-lator, said it had failed and faced a potential fine. The PLA's move, the latest in several "naming and shaming" exercises, met with an angry response from Royal & SunAlliance, which claimed it had met the target.

The total cost to the industry is set to top £4 billion.

Prudential is now offering guarantees that misselling victims will not suffer any financial loss on retirement, nor. will they have to prove that they were missold a pension. Sir Peter Davis, Prudential's chief executive, said: "We just want to get the whole thing sorted out." Prudential has dealt with 16,000 compensation claims from a total of 60,000 priority cases. At the end of June, it had only dealt with 3,500 cases.

Helen Liddell, Economic Secretary to the Treasury, has given companies until the autumn to make substantial progress on compensation. If they have not, she could make it difficult for the companies to continue to operate. She could also choose to lock them out of the Government's overall re-

life insurance companies are hoping to play a leading role. Legal & General is offering similar scheme to that of Prudential, and the Personal Investment Authority, the regulator, says that 12 other firms have applied to offer guaranteed compensation schemes. A PIA spokeswoman said: "We have to ensure that these guaranteed schemes are not seen as a soft option."

Around £35 million of Prudential's increased compensation figure, which was revealed in the company's interim results yesterday, was because of the abolition of tax relief on dividends earned by pension funds.

Operating profit was up 19 per cent, to £389 million (£320 million) at Prudential. The increase was the result of greater sales of investment and savings products. The dividend rises 10.3 per cent to 6.4p a share. Sir Peter played down bid rumours, which have been circulating all summer. The speculation has linked Prudential with Abbey National, Halifax and NatWest Sir Peter noted, however, that Prudential was still looking for a substantial high street presence that would add shareholder value.

Prudential's telephone bank, launched 10 months ago, has attracted £Z74 million of deposits and is costing around £70 million to set up. Other banking services are being considered.

Prudential's retraining of sales staff, prompted by intervention from the Securities and Investments Board, will be completed next month.

Wickes sues chiefs to recover bonuses

By SARAH CUNNINGHAM

WICKES, the DIY retailer that discovered a £51 million hole in its accounts last year, is suing two former bosses to recover £136,000 of bonus payments.

The company is claiming back £85,000 in bonuses paid to Les Rosenthal, former board member and head of the buying department. It is also reclaiming £51,250 paid in bonuses to Chris Miles, who was a senior manager in the department. Both men were suspended from Wickes in June last year, soon after the hole in the accounts was found. They later resigned. After an investigation carried out last year by Linklaters & Paines, the solicitors, and Price Waterhouse, the accountants, Wickes said that secret discount deals with suppliers had inflated short-term profits.

Writs against Mr Rosenthal and Mr Miles were issued this week by Linklaters on behalf of Wickes. The two men were paid the bonuses under schemes set up for directors and senior management. Mr Rosenthal was paid a bonus of £40,000 in 1995 and £20,000 in 1996.

He was paid an additional £25,000 that year as a discretionary bonus on the basis that Wickes' buying department had generated £57 million in rebate income. The later investigations showed that rebate income from suppliers had been seriously overstated. If the correct sums had been known, the bonuses would not have been paid. Wickes claims. Mr Miles was paid a bonus of

£23.750 in 1995 and a discretionary bonus of £27,500 a year later. The Serious Fraud Office opened an investigation into the activities of former senior management at the company in November. No charges have so far been brought though the investigation is continuing. Wickes is not believed to be considering claims against current or former suppliers.

Henry Sweetbaum, who resigned as chairman and chief executive in June last year, has since agreed to return £720,000 that was paid under a longterm incentive plan in 1994 and 1995. He also waived any claim to an additional £855,000 due under the same scheme. Trefor Llewellyn, the former finance director who now works at Caradon, has also agreed to pay back all £485,000 of his 1995 ner bonus payments. Wickes, now under new chief executive Bill Grimsey, carried out a 553.2 million rights issue in December, and is expected to post full-year pre-tax profits of about £4 million.

Indemnity cover to be sold direct by pioneer

By Jon Ashworth

ACCOUNTANTS and other professionals could save 20 per cent or more on professional indemnity cover with the launch of PI Direct, a direct sales insurer, in the City of London.

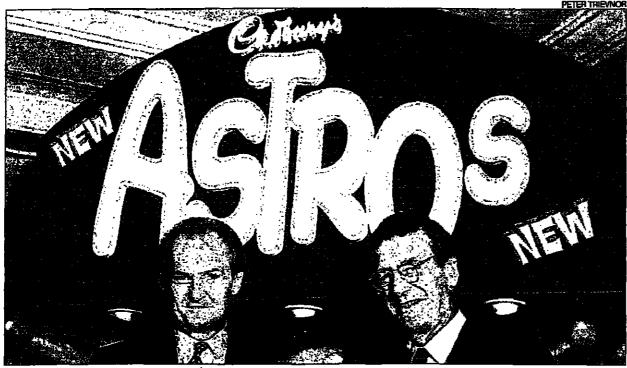

The company, founded by Michael Wood, 36, an insurance lawyer, is billed as the first dedicated professional indemnity underwriter in the UK to offer cover on a direct basis. Its target is firms of accountants, surveyors, engineers, architects and insurance brokers of one to nine partners. Mr Wood is chief executive of Pl Direct, which will offer quotations from today, and goes "live" on September 1. Jennifer Morrison, marketing director, has 18 years' experience as a professional indemnity broker. David Harvey is underwriter. and Robert Huxter, lately with MGI Insurance, is finance director.

The company is a joint venture between the management. Benfield & Rea Investment Trust, the insurance vehicle associated with the late Matthew Harding, and SVB, a Lloyd's management agency. Mr Wood said: "Our new approach to the way that professional indemnity insurance is provided and serviced will enable us to provide a better deal to a very specific section of the market. We're trying to make it easy and simple, and re-duce the burden on the small professional firm."

Insurance brokers will be given quotations net of brokerage, leaving then free to negotiate a fee for their services with their

Microsoft links with Apple in Net deal

APPLE COMPUTER and Microsoft have linked up in a deal announced yesterday. Microsoft will buy about £100 million worth of non-voting shares in Apple, and the Microsoft Internet Explorer web browser will become the default program used for connecting Macintosh computers to the Internet. The deal was announced by Steve Jobs, Apple's co-founder, at the MaeWorld conference in Boston. Other radical changes will mean that future Microsoft products will be created especially for the Macintosh - the most notable being Microsoft Office 98. Many Apple devotees hoped that Mr Jobs would take on the currently vacant role of chief executive for Apple, but they were disappointed. He will have a seat on the new board of directors along with Larry Ellison, chief executive of Oracle. Mr Jobs also told the MacWorld conference that three board members, including A. C. Mike Markkula, an early financier and one-time chairman, had resigned.

Meltek suspended

SHARES in Meltek were suspended on AIM yesterday at 40p ahead of an announcement that the company had asked bankers to send in receivers to its Webb Corp. believing it is "no longer commercially viable". Webb was acquired by Meltek in December. Meltek said that its other divisions are trading profitably at the operating level. A detailed announcement will be made as soon as practicable, the company added. At the suspension price Meltek was worth £2.8 million.

Adidas sales rise 40%

ADIDAS, the German sportswear maker, said it expected continuing strong performance in the second half of 1997 after net sales rose 40 per cent to DM3.14 billion (£1.04bn)in the first half. "We see no reason that the second part of 1997 will not be a reflection of the first part," Robert Louis-Dreyfus, chief executive, said. Adidas said it expected gross profit margins to remain at about 40 per cent of net sales in the second half of the year.

Zetters looks to football

ZETTERS, the pools and bingo group, reported a pre-tax pro-fit up from El million to £2.4 million in the year to March 3l on sales down from £19.7 million to £16.2 million. Earnings per share rose from 10.1p to 24.8p, although the total dividend for the year remains unchanged at 10p a share. Zetters said the decline in pools turnover year-on-year has reduced significantly since April I and that it expects the decline to bottom out soon with the start of the football season.

Select interim rises

SHARES in Select Appointments rose from 51312 p to 525p on a rise in pre-tax profits from £7.7 million to £13.3 million for the first half. Earnings per share rose 40 per cent to 9.5p a share in the six months to June 30 and the interim dividend rises 20 per cent to 1.2p. Tony Martin, the chairman, said: "The outlook for the staffing services industry remains very favourable as markets increasingly accept flexible working patterns and deregulation continues."

Lomond beats average

LOMOND Underwriting, one of the minnows of the Lloyd's of London corporate sector, yesterday reported a maiden return of 12.61 per cent on underwriting capacity in 1994, the latest year of account under Lloyd's three-year accounting rule, before agents' fees and a special levy to the society. This compares with a market average of 11.02 per cent. Lomond recommended a dividend of 10p for the year, payable on September 19.

Heywood buyback

HEYWOOD WILLIAMS, the building and car components maker, yesterday announced plans to buy back up to 10 per cent of its shares in the next few weeks. The news sent the shares up from 195½p to 206½p. A spokesman said: "We have a particularly strong balance sheet, but a particularly weak share price." Interim pre-tax profits before exceptionals rose by £7 million, to £21.8 million. The interim dividend remains 5p. Undiluted earnings per share rose from 9.3p to 15.2p.

Transport setback

PRE-TAX profits at Transport Development fell from £15.8 million to £15.1 million in the half year to June 30 because of "disappointing" conditions in the hire sector, the company said. Earnings per share increased to 7.73p from 7.42p and the interim dividend was maintained at 4p. Martin Llowarch, chairman, said: "We indicated that 1996 had been a difficult and disappointing year for vehicle rental and this has continued into 1997."

Metal Bulletin cheaper

SHARES in Metal Bulletin, the publisher, fell 72½ p to 950p as City analysts cut full-year profit forecasts from £6 million after disappointment over half-year results. Trevor Tarring, chairman, said that earnings growth may be slowed by sterling's strength. The company reported first-half pre-tax profits of £2.15 million, up from £2.04 million, in line with market expectations. Analysts, who cut forecasts, noted that 76 per cent of revenue is non-sterling. The half-year dividend is 6.7p (5.8p),

Delyn spurns Newport

SHARES in Delyn rose lp to 992p after the AIM-listed company rejected a £9.6 million takeover bid from Newport Holdings, the property group. Delyn said that it sees the bid, made on Monday, as most unwelcome and urged shareholders to take no action. Newport bid at 110p a share, offering four new Newport shares for every three Delyn ordinary shares. Delyn said that Newport's share price had performed poorly since its 1994 flotation.

White name, but that expensive diversion was not allowed to divert Boots The Chemist from its determined progress.

With the number of customers passing through its doors second only to the number who visit the Post Office, BTC concentrated on the sensible strategy of persuading them to buy more. The pharmacies with which Jesse Boot began remain at the core of the business but it can now claim to be the country's biggest seller of sandwiches and has fulfilled the admirable role of making life a little more difficult for Anita Roddick by effectively producing a copy-cat range of foot potions

Boots is now following the trend towards loyalty cards, and offering customers a sizeable 4p in the pound incentive to sign up. On its calculations, the card will generate a 4 per cent rise in sales and break-even within IS months. Initially, it is merely another marketing ploy. Longer term, however, the Boots card has the potential to be a ground breaker in creating the modern version of the company store, which once fulfilled all the needs of the workers. Looking ahead, the company envisages that its clever card, equipped with chip, could be programmed with details of everything from health in-surance and medical data to social services information. It is only a short step from there to envisage BTC cemented into a crucial role in the whole health and social services struc-ture, perhaps linked into doctors' surgeries and hospitals. The vogue term may have changed from privatisation to pub-lic/private partnership, but, whatever it is called, the potential

Higher rates: the counter argument

Stuart Hampson has learned to be guarded when he bumps into former colleagues from the Treasury. Asked if business is going well, he risks terrible retribution should he reply that indeed it is. For Hampson is now the chairman of the John Lewis Partner-ship, and he has found a depressing attitude at the Treasury which believes that if retailers are having a good time, then the economy is in peril.

Hampson and his fellow shopkeepers argue, although rather too sotto voce for it to have much effect, that this simplistic view is certainly no longer accurate, even if it once was. Growth in retail sales need not be an inevitable precursor of soaring inflation, the sole dragon on which the the Treasury, both civil servants and politicians, appear determined to concentrate their slaying power. Despite the headline figures on retail sales growth, the picture on the high street is very mixed. The country is over-supplied with shops and competition for business is ensuring that prices are not running rampantly ahead. Much to the chagrin of store companies, customers, even those with windfalls to blow, remain highly price conscious. This is a factor the Bank of England's monetary policy committee should be bearing in mind as it toys with whether to push up interest rates today. They should fulfil the markets' expectations. and lay off.

How GKN is hoping to cash in on carry

BY OLIVER AUGUST

GKN, the aerospace to automotive group, is making a bold move into the grocery sector with a new plastic tray for vegetables which it hopes will turn into a El billion business in Europe. Asda, the supermarket chain, has signed up as the first customer and GKN is attempting to create a new world standard for the plastic trays that will replace traditional cardboard of £203 million in the first half of the trays. CK Chow, the chief executive, said: "We are very encouraged by the results. The vegetables can stay on the same tray from the field to the shop." The new trays will be reusable, make food last longer and be environmentally friendlier. Supermarket assistants will be able to put the trays straight from the pallet on to the shelf. The group reported pre-tax profits year, up 12 per cent and ahead of forecasts. Without the rise in the pound the increase would have been double that. The interim dividend was raised to 10.5p from 9.6p. Earnings per share rose to 38.9p from 3L7p.

GKN has a cash pile of £248 million. out of which it will have to pay for legal damages to be finalised against Meineke Mufflers, the US subsidiary.

The group generated £218 million in cash in the past six months. Mr Chow said he was following a "strong growth strategy" which will entail further acquisitions. There would be no big announcements in the next few months, but GKN would play an important part in the "consolidation game" in the aerospace industry.

GEOBAL EXPANSION IN CONFECTIONERY

23% RISE IN UNDERLYING EPS

44 Cadbury Schweppes produced turnover of over £1.8 billion from continuing operations in the first half of 1997 and an increase in trading profit of 17%. Underlying earnings per share were up 23% to 14.9p. The direct comparison with our 1996 interim results is impacted by the sale of our 51% interest in Coca-Cola & Schweppes Beverages Ltd (CCSB) in February 1997, the strength of sterling and the absence in this half year of major restructuring costs.

We achieved positive results in both our beverage and confectionery business streams. Sales and market shares of both streams benefited from the introduction of new products, the continued international expansion of existing brands and higher levels of marketing investment. Our 'Managing for Value' initiative was launched to improve shareholder value.

We look forward to the second half of 1997 with confidence."

CHRYSALIS, the music to basketball company that owns the London and Manchester Heart radio stations, has added Yorkshire's Kiss FM to its portfolio in a £17.6 million deal, making it the largest radio broadcaster after the BBC.

The sale of Faze FM, a venture capital-backed station that started broadcasting four years ago, will boost its total number of potential listeners Richard Huntingford, head of the Chrysalis radio division, said the company will now decide whether Kiss is a stronger brand than its own Cardiff-based Galaxy station. Both broadcast dance music, against the "classic hits" formula adopted by Heart.

The loser will be scrapped and the winner will be rolled out across Britain, with the prospect of being broadcast in the North East of England by next summer. Kiss is listened to by 9 per cent of its target audience, against Galaxy's 16 per cent. Mr Huntingford said: "We will now talk to our marketing people and see which of the two is more appropriate."

Chrysalis is currently bidding for three FM licences in Central Scotland, the North West of England and the North East. If successful, it plans to broadcast another Heart in the North West, and roll out either Kiss or Galaxy in the other two areas.

Shares breach 5,000 as fears for sterling recede

THE City has changed its mind and decided that another rise in interest rates later today is unlikely. This put the skids under sterling and sent share prices surging to their highest levels ever.

The equity market breached the 5,000 level for the first time, with the FTSE 100 index closing just a shade below its best with a rise of 65.6 at 5,026.2. A total of 983 million shares changed hands, with blue chips again making most of the running. By contrast, the rise in the FTSE 250 was just 18.7 at 4,517.3, while the FTSE Ali-Share put on 25.0 at 2,339.74 and the FTSE Smaller Companies actually lost ground.

Once again the financial future led the way before closing at 5,044.0, a useful premium to the cash market. Brokers reported a noticeable change in buying habits among institutional investors. Blue chips remained top of their shopping lists, but the pound's weakness meant they are now buying cyclical companies with an exposure to currency fluctuations, rather than domestic issues such as banks and pharmaceuticals, which have dominated in recent months.

Those to benefit were the exporters and manufacturing companies. Gains were seen in RMC Group, 29p to £10.0712, Blue Circle, 1212p to 410p, TI Group, 20p to 57412p, Rolls-Royce, 512p to 243p, and Siebe, 23p to £11.1712. LIKE almost every other manufacturer, GKN has complained about the impact of the strong pound, which halved the size of the interim profit increase. But CK Chow, the new chief executive, had to admit that his global business was also reaping some benefits. GKN's German and French customers are doing brilliantly because of their weak currencies, and buying more parts from local GKN subsidiaries. This was particularly true in the car sector, where GKN's automotive division is growing at 7 per cent while competitors are stuck at 2 per cent. But Mr Chow knows that this cannot continue. The group has brought out a new version of its constant velocity joint. but the car sector as a whole remains flat. Further currency movements could quickly choke off GKN's silver lining.

The aerospace and the industrial services sectors are the star performers so far this year. GKN has a healthy long-term order book at Westland's helicopter business, but the aero structures business is more vulnerable. The sector is at or near its peak and furious consolidation efforts are expected. GKN has a cash pile big enough to go on the acquisition trail - but only if the damages still to be awarded in a US legal dispute do not spiral upwards. GKN seems to be relishing the growth opportunities in industrial services, a comparatively new business.

Cadbury

A 2 PER CENT rise in interim profits is hardly going to set pulses racing, but that is nothing new for Cadbury Schweppes. In establishing a global drinks business capable of taking on Coca-Cola and Pepsi, it has issued a stream of paper to fund acquisitions — which has merely served to depress returns to shareholders.

However, yesterday's fig-ures contained clear evidence that John Sunderland. chief executive since last September, is beginning to get a handle on things. It is no coincidence that the share price has recovered from a low of 46812p at the turn of the year to a high of 6112p yesterday. Much of the buying has been by US institutions, which now hold about a quarter of the shares.

Woolwich

AS A building society, the Woolwich had an excellent customer base, a firm grip on costs and a reasonable share. of the mortgage market -particularly in the South East, the main beneficiary of the recent housing recovery. As a £4 billion bank, it does not look quite so appealing. Under assault from Nationwide and the remaining mutual societies, its share of the UK mortgage market has fallen sharply, and its take of net lending has more than halved. This may prove temporary, but, in the meantime, Woolwich is sitting on a huge amount of excess capital that could tempt it into apparently easier and certainly more exciting foreign adventures. Cautious expansion in France and Italy, where the maximum home loan is 75 per cent of the property's value, looks harmiess Nevertheless, the Woolwich will do well to other cash-rich institutions. Investors keen on banks could find cheaper and more attractive alternatives, judging Woolwich on its own prospects. The 2.3 million private shareholders who still have their windfall shares have to decide whether to stick around for the long-tumoured takeover bid. However, potential bidders will have already had a good look at Woolwich in the runup to flotation. With just about everyone trying to talk shares, shareholders could

ir Ronald Hampel's most telling contribution to corporate governance is likely to be his heartfelt and understandable desire for his committee on it to be the last Judging by this week's preliminary report, ICI's: chairman may feel that the returns on time spent by half-million-ayear folk mulling such matters are diminishing rapidly to zero:

Others might offer different explanations. Tactically, the purpose of such committees has been to absorb controversy and avoid legislation. Tory governments wanted them to show that something was being done to clean up business. In turn, business wanted them to neutralise issues, ranging from high-profile corporate collapses to directors' pay, that might hasten the arrival of a hostile Labour government

So the Cadbury, Greenbury and Hampel committees, and several others led by people without knighthoods, have addressed issues squarely, knocked down any radical suggestions for changing the status quo but suggested

Now the Tories have gone and, perplexingly, new Labour does not seem hostile. This transition was epitomised by Lord Simon of Highbury. As Sir David Simon. BP boss, he was a member of both. the Greenbury and Hampel committees. Then he became one of the group who, as the Tories would group who, as the Tories would Ronald accepted the poisoned have it, traternised with new chalice, he did so as a proud Labour in opposition. Now he is a minister at both the Treasury and the Department of Trade and Industry. And Lord Simon's views do not seem to have changed, or needed to change, along the way. Ian McCartney, one-time scourge of "fat cats" and now corporate affairs minister, may be the average member of the CBI or the Institute of Directors. Yet any threat of the Government casting aside these reports with snorts of disdain and legislating for two-tier boards, pay controls, people's auditors and "stakeholder" power seem remote. These "Hadbury" committees have done their tactical job. They have seen big business through to calmer political waters. Or so it appears.

There is a more fundamental -reason to call a halt. When Sir industrialist who was keen to detend business against constant mischievous attacks. His preliminary report takes as its theme that there has been far too much attention to accountability and too little to business performance. Maybe so. Naturally, those who champion the company as an amoral force for economical efficiency are first to complain if society does legis-late. But leave that aside. As Shell and others know, market forces now put over the views of many interest groups with some force.

Responsibility to shareholders is also mainly in the eyes of the director. As the report points out, most shares are controlled by institutions, now usually on behalf of people whose views they do not know. At the level of big corporations, however, this relies mainly on stock market forces and particularly on that epitome of despised short-termism, the hostile bid. ICI's board. for instance, long rejected suggestions from some of us ( and some directors) that it should demerge pharmaceuticals. Then the predatory Lord Hanson took a stake and, having seen him

f Camelot's directors ever find public loathingfor them too much to stand, or if, as many assume, the Government refuses to renew the lottery operator's franchise, they should head for America. They will be greeted as.

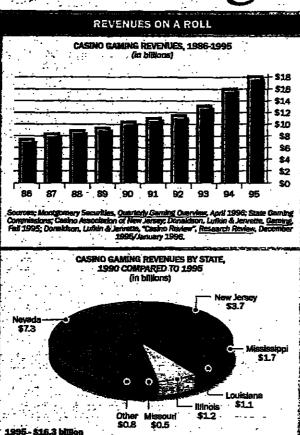

In the gambling boom that has gripped the US, casino and lottery bosses have been popularly credited with the power to lift the poorest communities out of poverty through jobs and investment. Every state but Hawaii and Utah has now embraced "gaming", the sporty-sound-ing label by which the industry prefers to be known. in 1995, "players" placed 550.3 billion (£339 billion) of bets, an increase of 14 per cent on 1994; industry revenues after prizes were $44 billion: state gaming taxes on casinos alone were $2.9 billion.

Until now, the Government in Washington has turned a blind eye to the industry. In 1970, a panel concluded after a six-year study that "the only role of the Federal Government should be to prevent interference by one state with the gambling policies of another".

For years, Indian reserves controlled a large slice of the industry, and politicians were sensitive to the complaint, in the words of one lawyer, "they took away the buffalo and the salmon, and now they want to take away gaming*.
But the Chinton Adminis-. tration has now set up a twoyear commission to take a harder look at the industry and not just because it has noticed that the Federal Government is losing out on potential tax revenue. The murder in May of a sevenyear-old girl in a Nevada casino while her father gam-

surfacing to grip the Ameri-can public's imagination, such as the recent case of four Nebraska people who, together, lost $256,000 over two years. One of them, Gregory Hausner, stayed at the same craps table for 50 straight hours without sleeping or eating, placing $5 bets until he collapsed into bed from exhaustion. That time, he ended $25 ahead, but over two years he lost $35,000. "Craps is my monster", he said.

A government assessment of the social and economic impact of gambling is long overdue. So is a thorough rebuttal of the industry's worst arguments for its existence, which have gained enough credibility to distort tax and social spending, to the cost of the poorest people in wise spend elsewhere. There is much local evidence that gambling cannibalises small businesses. In the decade after gambling was intro-duced, Atlantic City lost 40 per cent of its restaurants. Workers in the industry also tend to earn very low wages, and find it hard to progress to better jobs.

A second dubious argument is that state lottery revenue and taxes on casinos pay for local schools and hospitals, a claim that has earned gambling companies widespread public praise and makes many feel good about having a flutter.

The New York state lottery markets itself with the slogan "supporting education since 1967". But regional school boards complain that, in practice, their share of state money has not increased. Politicians opposed to gambling point out that as poorer people spend a larger proportion of their income on gambling, the use of gambling revenue to pay for essential services amounts to a highly

But a fifth lose enough to hurt their families. while about 4 per cent cannot stop without help, and 0.5 per cent become highly self-destructive. The industry claims, with some justice, that most studies have been small in scale. If it achieves nothing else, President Clinton's commission will perform a public service by taking a tough look at the figures on both sides of the argument.

But the problem is that even if the commission concludes that the benefits of gambling are more threadbare than the industry claims and the damage to the poorest people in society greater than previously thought, it is not clear that it can do much about it.

It is late in the day to start designing a national gam-bling policy from scratch: given the growing power of state governments to dismiss ton, it may be too late to have any effect. It would be politically impossible for the White House at this stage to tell state governors to shut gambling

The one policy open to the US Government is to impose federal taxes for the first time on the industry. Clearly, as even opponents of gambling point out, this would have the same regressive effect as local taxes, hitting poorer people harder than those richer.

But it is not necessary to be as cynical as directors of gambling companies to say that this is the most likely outcome. The lure of apparently easy money is as addic-tive for politicians as for gamblers.

But to dress up new taxes in the deceptive arguments of existing ones by claiming that the industry is always good for poor communities would be a pity. It would negate the only value the commission is likely to have - shedding light on an industry that has worked hard at being misunderstood.

My first time was when I left the law to work for Isaac Wolfson, the dynamic head of Great Universal Stores. have been classed as an swim. For the best part of a involuntary sale and not one where he would have been taking advantage of any spe-cial knowledge. Still, all this is behind us now, but a valuable lesson will have been learnt for all future businessmen. We do need an interchange between business and government, not because businessmen make better or more efficient ministers but because all government must be aware of the needs of the rest of the community. If we do not have sufficient regard for an enterprise society, to the wealth creation processes in our midst then our standard of living will go into relative decline. You have only to look across the Channel to see the results of governments failing to listen to the needs of business. Our new Government has started well in recruiting the likes of Martin Taylor and Lord Simon, although the Camelot affair was certainly a setback. Still, that is probably behind us now.

We are still early in the life of this Government and sufficient business leaders have already shown themselves to be sympathetic to the policies of new Labour for the Government not to be short of advice. Some may well be tempted to cross the line and enter the Government. When they do so (and I hope that some will in spite of the publicity of the past few weeks) they should remember that they are entering a new world where appearances are even more important than reality.

Down at Canary Wharf, fast-talking Morgan Stanley consolidated its position at number two in the table, advising alongside UBS, on its £1.2 billion acquisition of London Electricity. Morgan advised on 19 deals worth 65.4 billion in all. The prize for achievement goes to UBS, which made number three, a 15-place improvement on last year. Among 14-deals, UBS advised Coca-Cola Enterprises on the £1.9 billion acquisition of Coca-Cola & Schweppes Beverages. Morgan Stanley aside, US players

The taskforce's role in ensuring all future projects that come to the market are correctly focused and staffed will be critical. Success requires commitment, and not just from government departments and bidders. Advisers must have the right skills and be committed to the success of the project to ensure that it can be, and is, delivered. By working with the right advisers the Government, private sector providers, and, most importantly, the taxpayer will benefit from the right solutions being delivered. In general, where we see savings of 20 to 30 per cent then we can be sure that we are close to an optimal point. Sufficiency of risk transfer, on the other hand, often means transferring enough risk simply to create an off balance sheet transaction.

Risk transfer, value for money and affordability are connected. Transferring risks the private sector is unable or unwilling to manage will reduce potential value for money and lead to an unaffordability.

Public-private partnerships reflect a shift in the role of government in a number of countries from being a direct provider of public services towards becoming a procurer of services and a regulator. ## Competence rises above qualification

THE figures tell the story. There are roughly 27 million taxpayers in this country and four million of them have tax advisers. Despite assurances from the Inland Revenue that additional tax advice is not necessary, the impact of self-assessment must surely increase both the number of taxpayers seeking advice and the number of tax advisers there to provide it. And that will bring the issue of regulation back into the spotlight. Anyone can be a tax adviser and place their card in a newsagent's window, or put a listing into the Yellow Pages telephone directory. The result of a sudden burst of new business, as a result of self-assessment, will not show itself for another six months or so. But experience suggests that a growing number of taxpayers, at the bottom end of the market, will be disappointed. There will be a call for widespread regulation.

We have been there before. At the end of 1995 the tax charity, TaxAid, published a research report which concluded that "some" form of regulation of the tax profession is now inevita-ble. Now the author of that report, Sue Green of Bristol University, has, with the help of Kathy Leach of Warwick University, re-turned to the topic. They were asked by the Chartered Institute of Taxation to investigate the reasons behind what became categorised as "the 100 worst cases", drawn from the main accountancy bodies, the files of TaxAid. and of the Adjudicator's office, and individual cases sent in to the researchers. The idea was that such an analysis would give a clearer idea of what needs to be tightened up. And this is where the problems begin. Regulation within the financial world has invariably been prompted by some large criminal scandal or other. But the vast majority of examples of inadequate work can be pinned to simple incompetence rather than nefarious intent. The results of the new research confirm this but also point to another way forward. The research shows that "there can be an enormous gulf between the work undertaken and the office environment of advisers who are part of specialist, well-organised practices and those who number tax as just one of a range of activities undertaken "No one is immune to making mistakes, the report says, "but in the former category it is likely to be a technical mistake which leads to a complaint whereas, in the latter, complaints are more likely to arise from inadequate communication with a client."

The researchers found further disparities. Both groups can get things wrong. We encountered examples where qualified and unqualified practitioners were out of their depth, either to terms of the advice that they were trying to offer or the amount of work they had to cope with. We also spoke to unqualified practitioners who have years of specialist experience and who could offer advice of the highest professional standard."

In other words most tax advisers are doing a In other words most tax anvisers are using a good job. Where the public is being failed is generally through simple office incompetence. Practice management, or the lack of it, is what brings most professional advisers into contact with complaints bodies. Disciplinary hearings with complaints bodies. are more likely to ring to heart-rending tales of stressed practitioners unable to cope with running their own businesses than to devious characters cynically lining their pockets. "Much of what goes wrong."

says the report. "can be put down to poor communication with clients and inadequate office procedures."

The avalanche of self-assessment work is not going to help. But the level of complaints is still remarkably low. The question is how to regulate the tax profession, if at all. One difficulty is that it is a profession but it is not all under one roof. Unqualified tax practitioners are not under anyone's roof. And this might be the way forward. The research found that this group were particularly supportive of proposals. To regulate their profession as they see this as a way in which their experience can gain formal recognition". And the report suggests that an independent regulatory body may be required, in which case "such an umbrella hody could oversee the regulation of all tax practitioners within the UK, including those who are unqualified, and some form of registration of tax advisers might be the best way to achieve this".

If the business of tax advice does, as a result of self-assessment, need to extend down to become a mass-market business then regulation will be needed as an assurance. But it will be much more important to ensure that the public has a better chance of distinguishing competent tax advisers from the incompetent.

Genius of Gray's anatomy

pital bed, more vegetable than person. Her husband, a travel writer who calls himself J.G., gets his lissome agent to join him in talking to her. Together, they reveal they have had an affair: "after the lunch stuff" and a bit "squalid, or so he says. This does not please the agent at all, but she perseveres with a joint confession that gets weirder and maybe more fanciful, J.G. says he dreamt of his agent and wife in ecstasies of lesbian love, and the agent agrees: That's the truth of it, I wanted to be your lover, not his."

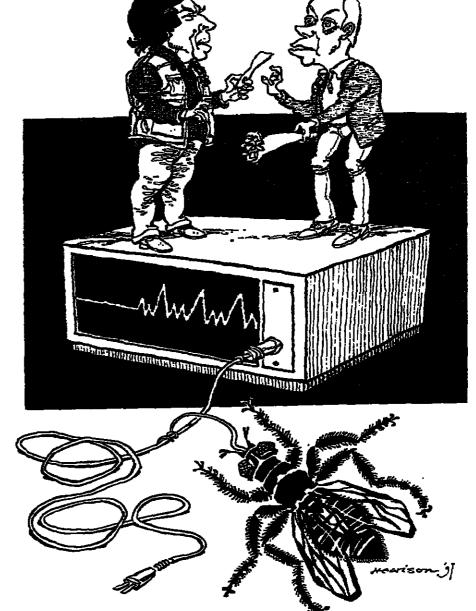

Who but Simon Gray could have penned that scene? Throughout his career he has travelled to strange, remote lands, but, unlike those from which Alan Bates's J.G. dispatches his jokey observations, they are situated in the heart, stomach and bowels. His dark continent, with its secret treacheries and convoluted pains, is human and inner. But in Life Support there is a difference, and a dramatically important one. This time emotional exposure has a highly practical purpose, which is to jolt a breathing corpse back to life.

After all, nothing else has worked during the weeks within which Gray's 100minute play occurs. J.G. holds imaginary conversations with Gwen, whose brain has been deadened by a bee-sting in the tropics, and some of these have touched on difficult matters. At times he squeaks out Aldwych her accusing or reproachful ripostes, mimicking her voice; at times he (and we) hear Georgina Hale's Gwen herself speaking. He also plays a cassette of Silent Night to her. gets his brother Jack (Nickolas Grace) to ask her body for a loan, and simply sits and stares at her. But nothing, not even his erotic revelations, gets more than an involuntary smirk or sigh from Gwen.

Once or twice I had my doubts - Jack's slimy callousness verges on caricature but by the end I felt that Life Support was one of Gray's finest, strongest exercises in sardonic tragedy, black comedy, categorise it how you will. It touches on many subjects. from the inscrutability of fate to the way we project feeling on others to the problem of whether and how long we should keep human vegetables officiously alive: but at its centre is something more wrenching. How do people cope with loss and grief, and especially with a loss that is not yet complete and a grief that cannot be clear-cut?

The parents of missing children must feel this way. So must the relatives of those struck down by strokes. Alzheimer's or other such afflictions, particularly if, as in Life Support, the relationship has an unsatisfactory, unfinished feel to it. That a lonely, resentful Gwen found solace in alcohol, and that J.G. was sexually unfaithful, only makes the situation more unbearable. "Everything glowed with a gleam, yet we were looking away," says J.G., quot-ing Hardy. He and Gwen shared a kind of confused love; they barely acknowledged it, and now it's too late.

The supporting cast responds well to Harold Pinter's deft direction. Bates, so often the cool ironist, achieves moments of genuine depth with the help of his elenched fists. bunched face, and red-eyed squints of repressed desperation. But who was the monster in the first-night audience whose mobile phone interrupted J.G.'s moment of maximum confusion, maximum suffering? I would have no compunction about switching off the oxygen of someone as

Equal to the challenge

Surremouth $0/ Kinzberg Moet HalVRadio 3 ···

ALL credit to Yakov Kreizberg and the Bournemouth Symphony Orchestra for tackling such a challenging programme on Tuesday night, and for bringing it off in such style.

The real rarity was the orchestral suite Rebus by Igor Markevitch. Better known as a conductor, Markevitch showed early promise as a composer: indeed, in his teens he was hailed as a "second Igor". Stravinsky described his rival as "not so much a wunderkind as a precocious brat", but Diaghilev had confidence in him and commissioned a ballet. That one was never written - Diaghilev died only a month later - but Markevitch subsequently wrote one in his memory. This was Rebus, a short title concealing a wealth of intellectual invention (the word means a riddle depending on visual symbols and audible puns).

The suite of six movements is a tour de force of contrapuntal virtuosity. The first couple of movements are desiccat-ed in the extreme, and even the ensuing Gigue is hardly a dance to tap your foot to. But the Variations and Fugue both accumulate enormous energy in their piling up of contrapuntal layers, and Kreizberg and his players convinced us of the potency of the score with their well-prepared performance.

Given the link with Stravinsky it was fitting that a work by Igor the First should be included, and a nice touch that it should be The Firebird - one the first Diaghilev ballets, as Rebus rose to the occasion with a rich palette of colour and the same sensitivity to phrasing that had earlier made Mozart's Haffner Symphony so satisfying.

Setting the seal on the evening was a superbly hedonistic performance of Korngold's Violin Concerto, with Gil Shaham the idiomatic soloist. Kreizberg's Straussian credentials allow him to find the space for Korn gold's succulent harmonies to settle. and there was inimitable panache too in the run to the finish. I wish they hadn't repeated those bars as an encore, however. Action replays should be kept for Match of the Day.

Spoon-fed elegance

Andrea Marcovicci Pizza on the Park

WHEN Andrea Marcovicci delves into a songwriter's repertoire she does not do things by halves. Nowhere else in London — nowhere in the western hemisphere, for that matter — are you likely to hear a number as delightfully quaint as How'd You Like To Spoon With Me? Interpolated into a long-forgotten hit show of 1905, The Earl and the Girl. the ditty marked Jerome Kern's arrival as a commercial force. It does not take long to see why this period piece originally sung by chorus girls from flower-strewn swings - lapsed into obscurity. Yet Marcovicci re-enacts the cov spectacle with such panache.

The American vocalist is ensconced for the rest of the month, her Kern tribute alternating with Ten Cents A Dance, her celebration of the songs of Ruth Etting. On the opening night it was the creator of Showboat who took centre stage. Marcovicci's finely sculpted features evoke the cool elegance of a transatlantic Kristin Scott Thomas. Her training as an actress - she starred with Sam Waterston in a Central Park production of Hamlet and appeared in Martin Ritt's film The Front - comes to the fore in the astute, waspish commentary that frames Kern's tunes.

of Boston?

weight of Kern's lush melodies.

There is the problem, too, of digesting the ripe sentimentality of some of his lyricists. What works well on stage

Edgar G. Ulmer made films fast and cheap. W.

Stephen Gilbert

previews a long overdue showcase

🖥 he name of Edgar G. Ulmer is unlikely to stop the traffic, save on those occasions when all the drivers are movie buffs. By the end of the month, however, his name ought to have been noised up and down Lothian Road, for Ulmer is the subject of an extensive retrospective at the Edinburgh Film Festival.

Widely forgotten in the United States (where he lived from 1923. when he was 19) and never known in Britain, the Austrian director is a film-maker whose work now speaks to increasing numbers of students and would-be directors, largely because of his sensibility but also in a period of tight money and inventive methods - because he so often made bricks without straw.

Between 1929 and 1965 Ulmer made 128 movies, just four of them for major studios. The figures disguise the fact that he habitually shot the whole film in six days. What was once seen as endearing cussedness now looks like pioneering virtue. Twenty-six testimonies to this style are on show at the festival. a crash course to be relished.

Thoughtful American cineastes doff their hats. "The director can rely only on his resourcefulness." says Martin Scorsese. "In fact Ulmer's idiosyncratic style grew out of such drastic limitations. This is why he has become over the years such an inspiration to low-budget film-makers." "He was remarkable." John Landis says. "He managed to overcome tremendous obstacles and do quality work within an extraordinary variety of place and circumstance. He always took advantage of film itself in lighting and camera placement to enhance the production

Martha Vickers and Sydney Greenstreet in Ruthless of 1948, Edgar G. Ulmer's sour and unyielding indictment of American business:

And according to Peter Bogdanovich, "somehow he seemed never to lose his excitement or enthusiasm, no matter how lowly the work. He found ways to make things interesting. Everything that might be considered a hindrance by most was a challenging test for him. He took wild risks all the time and always

The sensibility that now feels so

Made in 1946 for a paltry $20,000, it is a relentlessly bleak chiller that runs to only seven speaking roles and half a dozen sets. yet in the course of 69 minutes a man's romantic gesture in crossing the continent to be with his woman has led him down a road that undermines his sense of morality and then destroys his life.

lates the mood of expatriate European film-making at the end of the war, a consuming fatalism whose roots were in German expressionism but whose eves were on American corruption and the paranoia of being alone in a morally bankrupt land. Martin Scorsese calls it "an ironic morality play" and cites a line from the film's voiceover as a definition of film noir: "Whichever way you turn, fate sticks out its foot Another key picture is Ruthless. Ulmer's depiction of a Citizen Kanelike quest for wealth and power unredeemed by any "Rosebud" nonsense. Ulmer's driven hero performs a childhood feat of heroics similar to that of the hero of Frank Capra's It's a Wonderful Life: he saves another child from drowning (the same boy actor enacts the scene in each sentiment of Capra and the harnstorming self-advertisement of Orson Welles. Ruthless is as sour and unyielding as they come and Ulmer would have had it more so if the production company had supported him. But anti-Communism was at its height in 1948 and this indictment of American business was inevitably out and diminished. The pseudonymous screenplay credit masks the identity of Alvah Bessie. one of the Hollywood Ten. who served time for so-called un-American activities.

But Ulmer eschews both the

Early in his career, it was Ulmer who first put together Boris Karloff and Bela Lugosi in The Black Cat of 1934, which John Landis playfully dubs "glossy big budget Universal Studio horror". In fact its economy of means and the inadequacy of the juvenile leads scarcely harm Ulmer's vision of an intellectual joust, the subtext of which is the nature of capitalism.

He pulls off several stunning shots that anticipate an era of much more sophisticated camera work and, intriguingly enough, the image of a wife preserved in a tank resurfaces in this year's Batman & Robin. This is a neglected classic. only bettered in the genre by James Whale's Bride of Frankenstein made the following year.

dinburgh's season boasts collectors items that may not pass your way again. There is The Wife of Monte Cristo, a piece of Dumas apocrypha and Ulmer's biggest project to date in 1946, taking all of a fortnight to shoot, Green Fields, a movie told in a language he did not speak, Yiddish, which yet made money in New York and his name in France, where his reputation has remained high; and The Naked Dawn, the most important of his late movies in Technicolor, a triangular story of lust shot as a sweaty, Mexican

Edgar G. Ulmer is shining testament to the argument that you can make art without resources. With no marquee stars his films could never draw the town, but many a star has laded, while Ulmer's vision looks clearer today than in his lifetime.

mbridge as the last redoubt of Shakespeare on radio? Sounds daft enough to be true. Andrew Coker of London N19 wrote to The Times on Tuesday, saying that the change he would like to see on Radio 4 would be the dropping of endless amateur dramatics in The Archers. He cited the present Ambridge production of that play within a play, A Midsummer Night's Dream: "Actors playing countryfolk play actors playing countryfolk acting.

Quite so. One of the reasons I dislike The Archers is that it seems to be full of people one would cross a Bosnian minefield to avoid, so I am not best pleased with James Boyle's decision to give the show an extra airing every week. But that was a good tactical move by the Radio 4 Controller, who knows that

The thrust of changes, announced last week, is as predicted in this space some time ago. They are neither populist nor halfbaked and as such they are to be welcomed, though I cannot believe that the battle to retain The Moral Maze in its Thursday morning slot is yet con-

But back to Shakespeare One of the more interesting aspects of Boyle's new schedule is that drama slots will in future be no longer than 60 minutes, which effectively means that, yes, Ambridge can have the Bard on an exclusive contract.

Boyle was speaking in code if I have him right. For 60 minutes, read modern. Until now radio drama slots have tended to be dictated by theatrical conventions. One hour is not long to spend in a theatre but it makes perfect sense for radio. So if we are likely to get more of the fare I enjoyed at the weekend, then jolly good.

If Ladies' Day was fun at 60 minutes, two half-hour plays of a very different nature late Saturday night also showed the merit of brevity. in the great cathedral square of Cologne, a diminutive figure in an overlong greatcoat turns for a moment and pauses, suddenly magicked by the little mechanical pantomime of a musical clock.

This enchanted boy will, within ten minutes, be seated at the piano inside the concert hall of the Philharmonie, coiled like a spring, his fingers tangling with the woodwind. his feet marking out the dance of Bartók's Second Piano Concerto, his voice gently insistent, debating points of ensemble with the conductor in rehearsal. Two hours later, every one of Andras Schiff's fingernails is broken. "It's like a workout," he murmurs, "If only the keys were still made of ivory."

Before the seduction of the musical clock, Schiff's day had started with Bach — as it always does. And it is Bach

THOSE who enjoyed Sofia Gubaidulina's new Viola Concerto at the Proms last week will eagerly seize upon the latest 73 minutes from BIS's already formidable Gubaidulina discography. This important document of the complete piano music of one of the leading representatives of the New Music from the former Soviet Union acknowledges the seminal importance of the piano in the composer's musical awakening. Far removed from the principles of Soviet realism. Gubaidulina's own compositions caused considerable conflict in the 1960s and 1970s.

Beatrice Rauchs gives aptly daring and imaginative per-formances of the statuesque Chaconne of 1963, Gubaidulina's first commissioned composition, and of the 1965 Piano Sonata with its hauntingly beautiful Adagio.

Gubaidulina coloured her own childhood with a collecnon of Musical Toys in 1969: these 14 miniatures precede the sombre piano concerto. Introitus, of 1978, in which Rauchs is joined by the Kiev Chamber Players.

NEW RELEASES: Geoff Brown on the lowest common denominator antics of Rowan Atkinson's misanthrope

o prizes for guess-ing the star of Bean. Tight-fitting tweed jacker. Solemn trousers. Face and limbs in perpenual contortions. Lots

But wait. Something is different about Rowan Atkin-son's TV creation Mr Bean. A lowly employee of London's National Gallery, he is bundled off to Los Angeles to preside over the unveiling of Whistler's Mother at the painting's new home. Asked for an expert opinion, his face yanks itself this way and that in the struggle to get the brain working. Eventually he finds an answer: "Nice frame."
Says? Shouldn't Atkinson's

selfish, socially inept bumbler make jokes through grimaces and slapstick alone? He does most of the time on TV. But unless you are a visionary film-maker - Jacques Tati, say - you cannot sustain such a creation in a feature film without compromises. Bean has become a fulltime talker because he must further the plot, and interact with characters. He talks in America because the production company, Working Title, aims to conquer the American market.

Is all this sacrilege? It did not seem so to the young audience with whom I shared the film. When Bean let rip a thunderbolt of a sneeze, hilarity ensued. When he wet his trousers in a high-tech loo. ditto. Every bit of chaos Beangenerated, whether trying to skateboard or reducing Whistler's Mother to a blur. brought the house down. thing even more worrying than the jokes rounded up by the director, Mel Smith, and Mr Bean's creators (Atkinson, Richard Curtis and Robin Driscoll). This was the attempt to stretch the essentially obnoxious Bean into something resembling a human being.

As the house guest of Peter MacNicol curator of LA's Grierson Art Gallery, Bean expresses remorse at ruining his home life and, possibly, career. We catch glimpses of Bean's loveless childhood, and are asked to feel sorry. I balked at this. The need to convert a cartoon creation into a three-dimensional being brings other hazards, especially if the plot and the cast's performances still seem pitched at the cartoon level. Would the National Gallery besmirch itself by packing

Bean abroad as an art expert? If Bean is clever enough to penetrate the museum after hours and make repairs to the damaged painting, why is he otherwise so stupid? And why care two figs for a curator who appears, in MacNicol's performance, such a vacuous drip?

If you are laughing away merrily, such questions never arise. But Bean is the kind of shallow movie that only works if you shut your mind to the qualities of all great comedy: rigour, intelligence, imagination and humanity.

Oddly enough, the man who directed the Bean TV series, Paul Weiland, has his own movie out this week, a romantic connedy set in Italy. At best, Roseanna's Grave draws its humour from well-observed characters: there is a detailed texture to Saul Turteltaub's script that suggests a veteran's hand (he has been writing for American TV since 1958).

But neither writer nor director can escape the charge of making much ado about nothing. Consider the plot: Marcello's wife has a fatal heart condition. The village cemetery has room for only three more bodies, so Marcello tries to keep everyone alive. Even with abundant black comedy and romantic complications, this is not a very enticing hook. But Weiland and his multinational crew work hard at beguiling us, and their efforts deserve respect. Hear the inflection as Mercedes Ruehi calls her husband's name, Marcello: restament to hours with the dialogue coach. Look at Jean Reno, gesticulating away as Marcello himself, and confident enough in his as-sumed nationality to toss off jokes about the French.

Rowan Atkinson attempts to woo the American market with his mad, wacky, double-jointed thumb-aloft television creation, the appalling Mr Bean

Soon enough you accept the cast's impostures, and find enjoyment in the widescreen photography of Henry Braham, alert both to golden sunshine and earthy shadows. tion. It is neatly crafted, wellmeaning, airy piffle.

Grosse Pointe Blank suits today's mood much better. George Armitage, the director, specialises in the casual presentation of the bizarre and, in his first venture since the cult crime thriller Miami Blues, he keeps the screen jumping with abrupt dislocations of mood and tongue-in-cheek parody.

The material was shepherded to the screen by the actor John Cusack, who joined forces with chums from his Chicago-based New Crime Theatre Company to embellish Tom Jankiewicz's script about a hired killer attending his class reunion. Cusack takes the central role: an assassin at the crossroads, faces meeting classmates in Grosse Pointe, Detroit, with dialogue like: "I killed the president of Paraguay with a fork. How have you been?"

here is the problem of Debi (Minnie Driver), the school sweetheart abandoned on orom night ten years ago. He finds his old home torn down. Work also brings headaches: he has one hit to accomplish. and Dan Avkroyd, a rival assassin, is dogging his steps.

Armitage delights in the spectacle of this troubled killer brushing against estate agents and insurance salesmen. There is something winning about the plight of an extraordinary assassin plagued with an adult's ordinary fears, and most of the actors around Cusack neatly bounce off his panic.

Spending three hours with talkative young French intellectuals may not appear the week's best prospect, but Ma Vie Sexuelle satisfies far more than you might expect. Over time, the youngish director Arnaud Desplechin sucks you into the dithering world of Paul Dedalus, philosophy lecturer, whose thesis and love life sprawl in chaos over the usual Paris friends, apartments and bars.

A fresh leading player helps. Mathieu Amalric boasts tousled hair and an engaging smile, most helpful when unleashing paragraphs of selfanalysis. Just when the film appears bogged down, bizarre comedy erupts: a fall downstairs, perhaps, or the discovery of a colleague's pet monkey squashed behind a radiator.

Desplechin's camera tries nothing fancy. The screen needs to be kept clean and tidy for the weight of words, the play of faces and gestures. Amalric aside. Desplechin's cast, all lively young talents, are uniformly excellent.

Ma Vie Sexuelle looks espe cially sparkling next to Tierra, one of those flatulent stylistic exercises that give art movies a bad name. The grandiose imand metaphysical burblings only highlight the emptiness of director Julio Medem's tale of a furnigator called Angel and his sexual desires in an agricultural region plagued with woodlice.

Leslie: The young actor Mark Frankel died shortly after making this movie. His final performance is dashing, inteligent and beautiful.

When Russia did, Napoleon unsheathed his sword and prepared to dazzle the world with another display of his old tactical magic. He would destroy the Russian Army with a single hammer blow, occupy Moscow and impose terms on a chastened Tsar.

It all went dreadfully wrong. On St Helena, Napoleon convinced himself that his strategy had been correct and blamed his undoing on the Russian winter and his subordinates' shortcomings. This was pure delusion. The Russian summer, sultry and punctuated by torrential thunderstorms, proved more debilitating than the cold of winter for an army largely made up of French, German, Italian and Polish conscripts, many of whose hearts were not in the business.

WHAT is happening to the bookshops of Oxford? Niner & Hill, the specialists in deli-ciously printed academic texts. disappeared from the high street a couple of years ago. The friendly little shop on Cowley Road has gone, as have the stalls in the Jam Factory (where a friend, of mine enviably bought a copy of Complex Words with corrections by Empson). Titles in the Turl is for sale, "We hope it will be taken over by another fine bookseller," I am told. We do.

The second-hand literary section in Blackwell's has been squeezed again, and now mainly consists of recycled undergraduate texts. Sadly, also, the department is ludicrously reluctant to buy any-thing in print lest a sale be lost downstairs. Blackweil's fine book branch is one of the country's few and finest showrooms for private press books, but much of its business is done by post and at fairs. Thornton's in Broad Street is still its higgledy-piggledy self, and still is short of desirable books, and I have never been lucky at Waterfield's. Which leaves the forbidding Classics Bookshop — and Oxfam. So will there be no more generations of Oxford collectors like Warden Sparrow of All Souls, who once telephoned a younger don in tactical dudgeon to demand that he hand over a newly purchased rarity because the warden had been searching for it for longer?

Today we have naming of books. Like the naming of children, titles are subject to fashion. Since Flaubert's Par-rot and Einstein's Monsters, the celebrity possessive has become obsessive. I've recent-ly spotted Wittgenstein's Ladter, Ghirlandalo's Danghter. Gauguin's Skirt, Tolstoy's Bicycle, Schrödinger's Kitten and worse, Whe's Afguid of Schrödinger's Cat?), Salad. Time for a new rounne. André Bernard's amusing collection of anecdotes about how famous books came by their names - Now all we need is the Title (Norton, £6.95) — is full of the duds that got away. Gone with the Wind, for instance, nearly went by the board as Baa!

Baa! Black Sheep. Bernard also relates that Robert Lowell revised his work so thoroughly that according to his wife. Jean Stafford, a poem he began with the title To Jean: On her Confirmation" ended up as "To a Whore at the Brooklyn Navy Yard".

Three vanity publishing houses have been investigated by the Office of Fair Trading, as a result of concerns that they have been misleading customers. Vanity publishers solicit typescripts from aspiring authors, which for a fat fee they knock out as books. It is generally left to the author, however, to distribute them. Well, more people want to write books than to read them, so perhaps this is a legitimate service. We are urged to refer to it as "joint-venture publishing", which reminds me of a sign in New York advertising pre-worn dothes".

And yet customers are being conned: I recently happened to read a book preduced by one of the outfits in question, which showed uninistakably that the publishers had not performed their one inescapable duty: the text had not been edited. But then the lack of editing by some main-stream publishers is a contin-

Roger Scruton is unconvinced by a post-modern theologian who has substituted faith and love for nihilism and natural science on Cupitt is an iconoclastic theologian, who has used his wide philosophical knowledge and familiarity with cultural trends to defend a kind of postmodernist Christianity - a Christianity, without dogma, without faith, and without God. "We live at a time," he writes in After God, "when the god of the philosophers, the really existing, allpowerful Being out there, is rapidly fading away, and people are tending to assume that when he dies, religion dies too." The assumption, he believes, is false. Not only can we love God while. believing him to be dead for don't we. love our dead relatives just as much or more, when they no longer bother us?). we can cobble together a new religion by means of the very thinking which destroyed the old. This new religion will be "naturalistic" — founded in the scientific view of the world. But it will retain certain "tricks", as Copitt describes them, whereby we can live at peace with ourselves and each other. without the exacting demands of an" ancestral faith. For example, there is the Eye of God - the trick of seeing oneself as though through God's eyes, "under the aspect of eternity". There is also the trick which Cupitt calls Solar Living the trick of casting oneself unreserved ly into the flux of existence, spending oneself, living as hard as one can. burning without being afraid of burn-

then it would risk being dismissed as New Age whimsy. But After God also presents a passionate and fascinating view from outside the religious way of life. Cupitt argues that religion emerged from totemism precisely when our hunter-gatherer ancestors began to settle and cultivate the land. The growth of the agricultural way of life required a central authority, who would reinforce the attachment to a single place, and impose the laws and habits required by peaceful living. This authority was the god, who took up residence in his temple and sanctified the land and the city. Each god would be bound by a covenant to the people who worshipped him, and whose spirit he was. The god of religion is the state, symbolised and personified in supernatural form.

That view of religion is not new -- you find versions of it in Durkheim, Levi-Strauss and Nietzsche. But Cupitt has the gift of presenting old ideas in fresh and — as he would put it — "post-modern" idiom. He sees religion as a system of symbols which signify noth-ing apart from themselves. The language of religion is all that we have but, he goes on to suggest, it is also all that we need. For, properly understood, God is not distinct from the language which invokes and describes him. One is constantly startled by Cupin's vivid way of defending this point and forced to ask is it true? and: what then must I think and do? To the extent that Cupitt's purpose is to prompt those questions, his book must be judged a considerable

Behind his arguments, however, there is a real and dubious hostility to the old religions. For Cupitt, traditional of the distinction between Us and Them. and therefore of nationalism, xenophibia and war. In place of traditional faith Cupin wishes to put a Fukuyama-ish acceptance of the post-modern world the world of global markets and multinational enterprises, of fluid identities and virtual communities, in which everything is on offer and nothing imposed. Cupin's religion of "tricks" is designed as a survivor's kit in this new environment, and one that will neutralise the dogmas which set obedience and war above laissez-faire and markets. He openly admits that he is a nihilist, while believing that nihilism. suitably dressed up, is a peaceful and pragmatic religion that can be successfully marketed to the young.

I remain unpersuaded. Nihilism is all very well in a Cambridge don, but outside the cloister it has the habit of turning nasty. The old religious may have engendered terrors, but nothing on the scale of the two great experiments in global nihilism that have dominated our century and caused its most terrible war. Furthermore, I seriously doubt the philosophical underpinning of Cupitt's negative theology. He flirts with pragmarism, deconstruction and a variety of other assaults on "objective truth". The fact is, however, that he believes in the objective truth of science. The God whom Cupin dismisses with a valedictory wave of the hand never claimed to be part of nature, but only its transcendental ground. He is not mentioned by empirical science, because he cannot be. If he exists then naturalism is true, and the belief in God must be explained in Cupin's way. The explanation of religious belief cannot, therefore, be used to course, this does not mean that you can persuade post-modern people to return to pre-modern religion. But that is largely because you cannot persuade them to do anything, except what they already desire. "Post-modern" is just a trendy way of saying spoiled. Cupitt's "tricks" can be accepted by post-modern people because there is no cost attached to them. He believes there is no such thing as blasphemy, but surely, he must believe there is such a thing as hubris? And maybe there is truth in the old Greek religion, which told us that hubris will here is a photograph of La Goulue when she was young and relatively slim on the cover of Lucinda Jarrett's Stripping in Time: A History of Erotic Dancing. She is usually only known by Toulouse Lautrec's portraits of her. One of the inventors of the cancan, she will forever be associated with the heyday of the Moulin Rouge, although she ended her career as an overweight lion-tamer. La Goulue is only one of the cast of curious characters Jarrett assembles. But her history is subjective and far from universal in its scope. Male stripping and table dancing hardly rate a mention, and sex shows, only a few lines. The countries covered in detail are few: England, America, France, Germany and Belly-dancing has received a more interesting and thorough coverage in Wendy Buonaventura's Serpent of the Nile. In spite of the subtitle, Jarrett's book is more of a history of stripping, specifically. As such, it is also a history of the changing faces of women and censorship. A good many strippers were persecuted by the authorities. increasingly, Egypt, the home of the belly dance, is clamping down and introducing petty legislation about the showing of flesh. In past decades, there were similar problems in the West. For many years, strip-pers were not allowed to move when they were completely naked. Yet enterprising performers could always use absurd rules to their advantage. The fact that nipples had to be covered in Fifties Broadway tassels - something many modern go-go dancers would not be without.

Every country promotes a different kind of woman. In France, strippers were petite but curvacious, while America preferred them "big as a stetson, brash as a steer".

Several of Jarrett's heroines are given monologues. I liked these parts of the book least. The monologues all sound a little samey. Faction is often far less eloquent than facts. Stripping in Time is essentially a feminist and biased history: "Female strippers are all strong women proud of an expressive sexuality:" But is I've seen. Apart from a few notable and historic examples. most strippers are rather worse dancers than the average performer in a musical.

These days, a good dancer can earn more elsewhere. The average stripper is probably no more "strong" or "proud" than any other woman in any other job. But the profession has thrown up a few unusual characters. Apart from La Goulue, I rather liked Dora Vivacqua, Luz de Fuego, who specialised in having a snake remove her cache-sexe, thus bypassing Brazilian laws against full nudity. In a speech curiously reminiscent of Eve in the Garden of Eden, she would complain: "It's not my fault, it's his. He hates to see me dressed."

Nadas was 14 when the 1956 uprising in Budapest turned his family's world upside down, and the most obviously autobiographical narrative concerns a youth whose adoescence is gradually over-shadowed by awakening sexual and political perver-sion. The boy's mother is dying of cancer, his father is a Communist state prosecutor whose best friend — and rival for his wife's affections — has been imprisoned after the father's betrayal. The portrait of life among the Nomenklatura is unerly convincing, rising to a climax when guilt, hypocrisy, secrecy, and insanity combine in an unforgettable dance of death. As the narrator's mentally retarded little sister screams she is later consigned to an

of the 1970s. Their relationship forms the heart of the parallel narrative with which the novel opens. The lover, Melchior, is a more sophisticated version of the narrator's admired boyhood companion Krisztian. A successful radio journalist, Melchior seeks to isolate himself from the hateful reality of Honecker's state by creating an oasis of culture in his exquisite apartment.

Like the other characters who dominate this Berlin narrative, the hysterical actress Thea and the interfering landlady Frau Kuhnert, Melchior is living a lie - the lie of a privileged intellectual cynic, who pretends that the two super powers are all-powerful and interchangeable, while living on the sufferance of the secret police. It is all very well done, and I can testify to its authentic atmosphere, having lived in Berlin a few years

Less easily comprehensible is yet another parallel narrative, that of a novel which the author is writing in Berlin, but which is set in the earlier pre-Communist era of bourgeois

Thus throughout this tri-apartheid narrative. the unholy trinity of politics, sex and the family is explored on three different temporai planes. To what should one compare this incomparable novel? lts digressions are as entertaining as Proust's, its ironies recall Thomas Mann, its themes suggest Robert Musil. and its humour Italo Svevo. But Nadas is his own man, very much of our time, unselfconsciously attempting to do justice to his catastrophic experiences. In so doing, he restores dignity to the novel: the poetry of history.

The unparalleled success of Holmes is owed, in large part, to the flawed and not wholly attractive nature of the detective himself. However brilliant he may be, Holmes can be sanctimonious, superior and fabulously patronising. > Fate intervened. "My Army coach told someone that I might be worth watching, Portsmouth gave me a triai and I scored three goals in three games on their pre-season tour to Scotland," Bradbury recalled. "They then offered me a contract and I signed. I've always wanted to be a footballer."

It meant farewell to duty in Omagh and Fermanagh. "We'd mix it up a bit." he said. "Sometimes we'd be out on patrol in the country, sometimes in the urban areas. Nothing nasty happened, I don't think I ever got fired at I quite enjoyed it actually.

"I was hoping to do my corporal rank, but, in the end. was an easy decision to leave. It was quite a change initially, but I'm sure all the Army training was good for me. You learn about discipline, about getting on with other guys and working as a team. You also achieve a good level of fitness, which obviously helped me when I switched to football full time."

Private Bradbury, junior in-fantry battalion middleweight boxing champion. Five knockouts got him into the final, in which he beat his opponent on points. "I put him down but he got up again," Bradbury said.

"He was a good mate of mine and, at first, it was a bit strange fighting him. I didn't really want to do it. until he smacked me one, but we were still friends afterwards. I

Bradbury will now be punching his weight. 13st 3lb, at Maine Road, having left Portsmouth - who bought him out of the Army for £400 — in a £3.5 million move last week. He scored 17 goals last season and another two on his debut for City on Saturday, in a 3-0 win against Burnley.

radbury said: "It's all happened so quickly. it's been really hectic. One minute, I was playing with Pompey and looking forward to the new season; the next, I was travelnorth to talk to Manchester City.

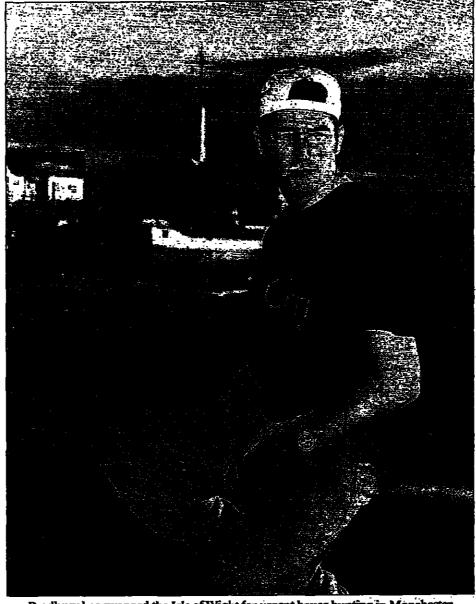

He met Frank Clark, the City manager, and struck a deal inside 90 minutes. didn't take long," he said. "I Born on the Isle of Wight, Bradbury originally played Cowes Sports in the Wessex League. "Dad also used to take me to watch Southampton. Portsmouth and a lot of the southern clubs, but I never supported anyone in particular," he said.

He lived on the island with his parents, Mike and Paula, and was in the process of organising a move to the mainland. The daily grind of travelling to Fratton Park by ferry or hydrofoil - at a cost of £40 a week, including a shrewdly negotiated 50p a day discount - had become tiresome.

Then City came calling and his advanced plans to move to Hedge End, near Southampton, fell through. He and his girlfriend, Hayley, have swift-ly had to switch their househunting excursions to Manchester. Bradbury maintains a calm perspective, a refreshing can'tquite-believe-it attitude that should serve him well amid the welter of expectation at Maine Road. He also laughs off the best wishes of his former team-mates.

"They've all been ringing me up saying they're going to give me a good kicking," he said. So, on Saturday, Manchester City start the new league season, against ... Portsmouth.

Bradbury has swapped the Isle of Wight for urgent house-hunting in Manchester

RACING: JOCKEY CLUB ACTS OVER RUNNING AND RIDING OF WAIT'N'SEE

Golden Pound gives Kieren Fallon his first Brighton winner in the Tote Credit Sprint Handicap yesterday

Easterby is fined £2,500

By Richard Evans RACING CORRESPONDENT

MICK EASTERBY, the trainer, was fined £2,500 and jockey Terry Lucas suspended for ten days yesterday at a Jockey Club disciplinary committee hearing into the running and riding of Wait'N See at Doncaster in May,

The Yorkshire trainer was fined for a breach of Rule 151, which governs "non-triers". Wait'N See finished minth of 12 in a Doncaster maiden in May before winning at Carlisle three weeks later when backed from 11-2 to 11-4. Lucas, who rode Wait'N'See on both occasions, was also found to be in breach of Rule 151. His suspension will begin on Saturday.

The committee concluded that Lucas had failed to obtain the best possible placing on Wait'N'See when the gelding was beaten at Doncaster. Easterby was fined because Lucas's failure was as a result. of the riding instructions he had given his jockey. Newmarket is to modernise with the appointment in the director for the town's two famous racecourses. The role of chief executive, filled by Nick Lees, is to be discontinued. Lees, who has been at Newmarket for 24 years, has been offered a seat on the board of Newmarket Racecourses Trust and will become director of racing - but report to-day management of the two tracks.

The changes are similar to those introduced at Ascot when Douglas Erskine-Crum and Nick Cheyne were brought in a couple of years ago - a point acknowledged yesterday by Peter Player, the chairman of Newmarket race-COURSES.

"All sensible racecourses are beginning to realise this is now a multi-faceted business. We have to get up the speed on marketing, sales and modern management disciplines. The board at Newmarket is dealing in big money and has to be structured so we take the right decisions," he said.

The newly created post of managing director, which will be advertised this weekend. will carry a salary upwards of ES5,000. The MD will develop and implement a five-year plan and build substantially on the current level of profits. We are looking for someone who will have particular skills in sales, marketing and up-toparticular responsibility for date management tech-over the next decade, including the planned development of the Rowley Mile grandstand. Our small but capable management team is becoming stretched." Lees said: There can be little doubt that the existing

Tufnell hoping his turn has come

By MICHAEL HENDERSON

SO FAR this season it has been a case of "always the bridesmaid" for Phil Tufnell. England's senior spin bowler. He has been selected in the party for each one of the five Tests and, until this week, he has been released in time to play for Middlesex. Now, as England approach a game that they must win to have a chance of regaining the Ashes. he hopes to play his first Test in this country for three years. and his first ever at Trent

Hopes, not expects. He has seen too much in this year of damp, seaming pitches to take anything for granted. Indeed, his on-off Test career can be interpreted as one long lesson in disappointment. The last nime he played on home soil was against South Africa at Headingley in 1994 and at times since then he must have despaired of getting another

It has been disappointing not to play this summer." he said yesterday, "but there's no point moaning about it. You've just to carry on and I've always tried to play my hardest for Middlesex." AlThough he cannot really say it, any more than he can grumble about the kind of pitches that England have sought, wisely or unwisely, one senses that he has missed the challenge of bowling at the Australians.

Indeed, he has rarely been trusted in this country, where he has played only six of his 27 Tests, but desperate times require radical measures. If he gets the nod, if Michael Atherton wins the toss for the first time in this series and if England bat properly. he should have that challenge he craves in the fourth innings.

NORTHAMPTON (first day of four, Worcestershire won toss): Worcestershire have scored 433 for five wickets against Northamptonshire

WHEN John Blam, 18, on his championship debut, dis-missed Tim Curtis with his fifth ball, Northamptonshire could not have imagined the punishment that their callow attack was to suffer later as Philip Weston and David Leatherdale both made centuries and shared a fifth-wicket partnership of 241 in 51 overs. Weston, who was playing only because Graeme Hick was absent with a bruised finger, advanced to a career-

PERHAPS roused by Lord MacLaurin of Knebworth and Tim Lamb looking on from the president's tent. Kent's toporder batsmen stirred into life yesterday. They could not have chosen a bener occasion to come good than this meeting with Essex, who lie one place below them in the table in fourth position.

The Kent top five had failed to muster a century in Il championship matches this season and nobody would have been more disappointed about that than Alan Wells, signed from Sussex amid much fanfare. Although he was Kent's leading run-scorer before yesterday, he must have felt he owed them a big

Ratcliffe's class puts shine on a rainy day

By Rupert Cox •

THE OVAL (first day of four; Surrey won toss): Surrey have scored 164 for two wickets against Durham

DESPITE the assiduous efforts of the England and Wales Cricket Board to reform our summer sport, one aspect of the game remains beyond their control — the British weather. Yesterday, at the Oval, as if to emphasise the point, the threatening clouds that enveloped the ground for much of the day deprived two teams struggling to make an impact on the championship season of 59 overs. With the home team stripped of four Test players, it seemed that the drab conditions might overshadow events on the field, particularly once Mark Butcher. dropped by England as well as disciplined by Surrey on Sun-day, was bowled by Michael

Foster, via his pads, for 24. However, an excellent halfcentury from Jason Ratcliffe, during an unbroken thirdwicket stand of 97 with the lefthanded Ian Ward, handed

Surrey the initiative. On a humid morning, allied to a greenish Oval wicket, Chris Lewis, the acting Surrey captain, elected to bat first. Surrey made an untroubled start, only for the openers, Butcher and Darren Bicknell, to fall in consecutive overs.

It was Ratcliffe who caught the eye, assured off front and back foot, he played the swing-ing ball in textbook fashion, detecting the swing early and playing it late. It is a moot point whether his position, with Test players available, would be under threat, but with near on 600 first-class runs he is one of Surrey's leading run-scorers. His fifty arrived in 65 balls before the rains took the edge off Surrey's day.

By BARNEY SPENDER

LORD'S (first day of four, Middlesex won toss): Middlesex have scored 212 for three wickets against Hampshire

MARK RAMPRAKASH certainly enjoys playing against Hampshire. Two years ago, he battered them around Lord's to make 163 not out and last season he made 108 at Portsmouth. Yesterday, he stood on the brink of his hattrick hundred when bad light and then rain brought a premature close to the day. Arriving at the crease in the sixth over, after Paul Weekes had gloved an attempted hook, he immediately looked at ease as the Hampshire attack, lacking any firepower, strove admirably to maintain a decent line and length on a. pitch devoid of gremlins. Jacques Kallis played some exquisite shots through the off-side, but the South African patience when he chased a wide delivery from Stuart Milburn and gave Adrian Aymes his second catch. Ramprakash was in less generous mood. He has already posted four first-class hundreds this summer and he cruised past the 50 mark for the ninth time in 17 championship innings. His defence was watertight and the occasional stray delivery was sent to the boundary in a flash, but, thanks to a monk-like self-denial, he finished on 99 after blocking or leaving 18 deliveries as the light deteriorated rapidly.

Hampshire's perseverance was rewarded when Mike Gatting dollied a Matthew Hayden medium-paced long? hop to Robin Smith at mid-on. The breakthrough ended a third-wicket partnership of 128 between Ramprakash and Gatting and it was Hayden's first wicket for the county

How the county set-up could look

CRICKET CORRESPONDENT

COUNTY supporters yesterday wrestled with the complexities of the Mac-Laurin plan to reinvigorate the county championship. Put simply, the proposal involves splitting the 18counties into three confer-ences. No fixtures are planned between teams in the same conference and the season will end with cross-conference play offs, possibly over five days, to decide finishing positions. It is inevitable that this system, if approved by the counties on September 15, will take time to gain acceptance. Many may regard it as a motivation for shortening the quantum leap to promotion and relegation.

The aim is to achieve roughly equal conferences and to retain traditional local rivalries. The counties will be divided into six regional groups of three. These groups will be seed-ed on the basis of finishing positions this season. The conferences will then be constituted by an equal division of top, second and third-seeded teams.

The regional split is: Middlesex, Essex, Surrey; Kent, Hampshire, Sussex: Glamorgan. Gloucester shire. Somerset: Warwickshire, Worcestershire, Northamptonshire, Derbyshire. Nottinghamshire, Leicestershire; Lancashire, Yorkshire, Durham.

Teams from the same region will not be bracketed together. Taking the current championship table as the guide, conferences for next season would look like this:

CONFERENCE B: Gloucesteral Kent, Surrey, Ducham, Wanatoks Nottinghamshire

CONFERENCE C. Somestet, Harro-chine Essex. Yorkshire, Worcester-

CRICKET: LARA'S LANDMARK SURVIVES AS WORLD CUP-WINNERS ENJOY RECORD RETURN

Sri Lanka ascend to new heights

FROM EMMA LEVINE IN COLOMBO

A CACOPHONY of firecrackers accompanied the celebrations at the Premadasa Stadium here yesterday when Sri Lanka passed the Test match record score that had stood for nearly 60 years. Amid the lengthening shad-ows of the final day of the first Test against India, it was the final milestone in a long line of records achieved during a remarkable match and the icing on the cake for the World Cup-winners, who aspire to be recognised fully as a Test playing nation.

The previous highest Test score of 903 for seven, made by-England against Australia in 1938, was in Sri Lanka's sights when they began the day at 587 for one. They finished on '952 for six and the team record was consolation for Sanath Jayasuriya, the Sri Lanka opener, who had been in tears after he was dismissed for 340 - 35 runs short of Brian Lara's record Test score. I felt a great pressure on me when I came out to bat this morning," he said afterwards, "and obviously I am disappointed - but at least my country has made a great achievement."

After the pinfully small number of people who had witnessed the record-breaking partnership of 548 between Jayasuriya and Roshan Mahanama on the previous day, the stadium gates were thrown open and around 32,000 spectators poured in to create a carnival atmosphere. They had come to experience the moment when they could say bye, bye Lara", but they were to be disappointed. When the Sri Lanka pair resumed their innings, they continued the trend that they had set during the previous day's play, sending perfect square cuts and straight drives to the boundary. They looked so fresh that it was hard to believe that they had been batting for more than two days in the Sri Lankan

India were hewitched, but somehow managed to break the spell. Mahanama was the first to fall, trapped leg-before by Kumble with the score at 615 and the partnership at 576. As so often seems to happen, his team-mate followed him back to the pavilion shortly afterwards. Jayasuriya was caught by Ganguly, off Chauhan, in the next over and the stadium fell silent. Lara's record had survived.

Now all attention focused on a target of 903. Aravinda De Silva did his bit, making 125 to become the sixth century-maker of the match, while Arjuna Ranatunga, the captain, made 86 and Mahela Jayawardena, making his debut, scored 66 to ensure Sri Lanka reached their goal and prolonged in-dia's misery.

Their first innings total of 537 for eight declared now paled into insignificance, but if Sachin Tendulkar, the India captain, was worried about being on the wrong end of such a record score, he kept his thoughts to himself. In-stead, he vented his frustrations on a pitch that he described as until for Test cricket" and hinted at his disappointment at Sri Lanka's reluctance to play for a result in the match

'If we had lost the toss and batted second, we could also have played a massive innings," he said. "We only lost wickers because we took chantes and went for runs." India must now pick themselves up before the next Test. which starts on Saturday.

Having achieved great success in the one-day game, this momentous achievement comes at the right time for Sri Lanka in their efforts to persuade other nations to play them in a full Test series. They have one Test in England next summer at the end of England's five-match series against South Africa.

Duleep Mendis, the Sri Lanka team manager, knows that this could affect the attitudes of "those countries who don't feel we can earn them enough gate money in a Test match". After their World Cup victory, numerous successes in other one-day tournaments and these latest accolades, Sri Lanka's drive to become the best cricketing nation in the world by the year 2000, an ambition that looked fanciful two years ago, is gaining momentum.

Horse takes a tumble as Chapot races in

FROM JENNY MACARTHUR

LAURA CHAPOT, from the United States, who is competing at the Dublin Horse Show for the first time, had the satisfaction of leaving the cream of Europe's showjumpers in her wake when she and her thoroughbred gelding. Aika. won the Kerrygold Welcome Stakes. the opening international

Her victory was not without its drama, however. In the IIhorse jump-off, Chapot, 25, raced so quickly around the six-fence course that her game horse slipped after crossing the finishing line and fell on his side, suffering a small cut on his near fetlock.

Chapot, despite the fall, was delighted. "I'm not used to seeing so many top horses show," she said. "It's a lot of fun."

Annick Chenu. of France, who fell from her speed horse earlier in the day, produced a composed and stylish round on her grand prix horse. Baeken Platiere, to take second place - less than a second ahead of the thirdplaced Jurg Friedli. of Switzerland, on Gyssmo.

Great Britain's six leading riders all failed to reach the jump-off. Nick Skelton, on Showtime, and Robert Smith. on Mighty Blue, had eight and 12 faults respectively. The other four - John Whitaker, on Grannusch, his younger brother, Michael, on Absonm. Di Lampard, on Abberva il Dream, and Geoff Billing ton, on it's Otto - all inc. irred four faults.

IN BRIEF

Garrido out to confirm Ryder Cup position

IGNACIO GARRIDO, of Spain, will begin the Czech Open golf tournament today confident that he can consolidate his place in the Europe team for the Ryder Cup after being granted a late invitation to play in the US PGA Championship next week "Things seem to be going my way." Garrido, who is tenth in the Cup rankings, said.

Thirteen of the top 20 in the table will be chasing points in Prague, with the most notable absentees being Per-Ulrich Johansson, of Sweden, Thomas Bjorn, of Denmark, and Miguel Angel Martin, of Spain, who are, respectively, sixth, seventh and eighth.

Agassi slip

Tennis: Andre Agassi, the former world No I, is likely to see his ranking fall into the mid-seventies after his defeat by 6-3, 6-1 at the hands of Gustavo Kuerten, the French Open champion, in the first round of the ATP champion ship in Ohio.

Cedric Pioline, a Wimble don semi-finalist this year, is the latest entry for the Samsung Open on the clay courts of the West Hants Club, Bournemouth, next month. He joins the British No 2. Greg Rusedski. Felix Mantilla and Carlos Moya.

Penalty point

Hockey: The England women's team came within 11 minutes of losing to Japan for the first time before Denise Marston-Smith converted a penalty stroke to earn a 1-1 draw in the World Cup qualifying tournament in Harare yesterday.

Coming home

Golf: Alison Nicholas, of Great Britain, plays in Europe today for the first time since winning the US Women's Open when she takes part in the McDonald's WPGA championship of Europe at

Bear swift to press her case

By EDWARD GORMAN, SAILING CORRESPONDENT

WHEN she was first launched ebb tide, which swept them prize, believing that a tidegate two months ago, Independent Bear's Cowes-based designer, John Corby, described her as the most advanced CHS vacht ever built". That seemed like a hostage to fortune, but Corby, whose father invented the Corby trouser press, has not been embarrassed yet. Yesterday, the boat with the big bear motif on her topsides and spinnaker did her reputation - and Corby's - no harm by romping away with the Britannia Cup, the biggest prize at Skandia Life Cowes Week, which is raced for by the maxis and Class I together. Not only did Bear, owned by Tim Louis and Kit Hobday, get her claws on the silverware, but she did so by nine minutes on corrected time.

In the event, the smaller yachts from Class I took all three top places, benefiting from a freshening breeze towards the end of the five-hour race and the strengthening westwards down the ea stern Solent to the finish. The second-placed yacht was Pl. ulip Tolhurst's new Fart 40, W.'arlord VI, which finished se venth among the Class I yachi's on the water, with Stepher 1 Bailey's Murray 4l, Arbitrator, third. Ludde Ingvall's Ericsson 80, Nicorette, took the line honours, but was demoted to eighth on handicap. Michael Patten, who shared driving duties on the winning boat, had thought that a win was not on the cards. "When we were set the course, it was terrible, because there wasn't a beat in it," he said. "Fortunately, the wind backed and we got a beat against the tide - it all helped us no end because we are very good to windward."

Hobday himself, who followed the race from the team inflatable, was surprised that Bear had taken the overall midway through the race had given the maxis an advantage over the smaller boats. Although most classes had some racing yesterday, the wet and windless weather over the past few days has dampened the atmosphere at the regatta. In some classes, including the x-boats, which again did not race yesterday, there is understandable frustration, with unly one race completed in five d. 3ys.

In the Glenfiddich Melges 24s , Kevin Sproul, in Glenfida ich 1. took the honours from the European champion in the class, Giorgio Zuccolì, of Italy, in Ullman Sails. In the Hunter 707s, Christopher Body and Zoe Trumper's No 13 and the second-placed Tea Party, ow ned by Martin Hoar, were so far in front at the finish that the rest of the fleet. led by Antony Soanes's Gauntlet, were completely out case of athletics "coming home". The world championships of track and field were awarded to Athens. to Greece, where, for thousands of years, the ancients nurtured sport in its cradle.

Yet as the world championships opened, in a massive new stadium nobody, it seems, had bothered to tell the Greek public that they were supposed to be part of the action. Rows of empty seats caused heads to be shaken and may have dealt a fatal blow to Greek prospects of hosting the Olympic Games of 2004

In a contest that seems to have been as bitter and exciting as anything on the track, the Greek organisers and the International Amateur Athletic Federation (IAAF) have taken turns at blaming each other for the pathetic turnout. The LAAF declared itself

Vangelis Şavrannis, the director-general of Athens '97, said angrily: "We asked the LAAF to move the championships to the end of the month when the stadium would be full. They didn't listen."

in the first four days of the championships, the daily average sales of tickets has been fewer than 24,000. The canacity of the stadium is 85,000 and the organisers have been working flat out to dream up gimmicks to pull in a crowd.

The problem is that half the population of Athens is on summer holiday and the sea and sand have proved a more popular lure than the track. This means not just empty seats but empty tills, and Greek newspapers have been predicting a deficit of more than £2 million on the championships.

The final cost to Athens could be many millions and the Greek Athletic Federation made things worse by agreeing that the IAAF need not contribute to the cost, as it has done in the past. These championships are seen as the final card in Athens' bid to secure the 2004 Olympics and there are about International Olympic Committee visitors scrutinising from the stands.

Many believe that what is really going on in Athens this week is a struggle between the Greeks and the Romans for who gets the Olympic Games. Athens and Rome are bidding against Cape Town. Buenos Aires and Stockholm and the decision will be taken in Lausanne on September 5.

Recent history makes one wonder if anyone really wants the hassle and expense of big, overblown championships like these anyway. There are always too many events with too many competitors and the whole thing is spread over too many

Yet every time that such games are staged, the organisers boast that they are better and bigger. In Athens. we are told, there are athletes from a record 200 countries, early days of these championmaking these championships the best-attended sports competition, in terms of competitors, in history. There are 1,225 men and 732 women

More countries than before are watching the action on television, with 212 countries taking footage. The IAAF boasts that 3.3 billion will watch these championships on

However, the Athenians are well aware that Atlanta is still smarting after the wounding experience of staging the Olympics last summer and, despite all Nebiolo's enthusiasm, there is considerable hostility to the Games in Rome. One anti-Games lobby group is so well organised and funded that it has published a book, in English and Italian, entitled 10 Good Reasons to say No to the 2004 Olympics in Rome. Traffic. corruption, pollution and above all the crippling long-term costs are all invoked by opponents of the Roman bid.

They will never convince Nebiolo. While the public in Athens may have stayed away from the wastelands of heats and semi-finals during the ships, the battle between Nebiolo and the Greeks over who gets the Olympics is something that they understand — and a contest you could sell tickets for.

After Nebiolo's taunts about the empty stands, the Greeks finally flocked to the stadium on Tuesday evening. Nearly all the seats were full - and the tickets had been paid for. To bang the message home, in one of the stands a Greek held up a placard reading: "We're here Primo."

Of course, it also helped that a Greek, Kostas Gatsioudis, was heavily fancied in the javelin. He finished with a bronze medal, but his effort packed them in. As the Greeks found when one of their shepherds won the first Olympic marathon in 1896, in front of more than 60,000 wildly enthusiastic spectators, you cannot beat a local hero if you want to fill the stands.

An entertaining departure

Airport BBC1, 8.00pm (except Scotland)

More than nine million people have been uning in to this anthology of tales from Heathrow and it is not difficult to understand why. Part of the appeal is watching other people going through such horrors as overcrowded lounges and delayed flights. But what hooks an audience is the soap opera ploy of regular characters and a raft of skilfully-spliced stories. A star of the series is Jeremy, the plump, genial and very British supervisor of the Russian airline Aeroflot. A running joke is that Jeremy keeps losing passengers. And so it is toright, except that 25 meals have gone missing as well as nine Russian schoolchildren. But credit to Jeremy, he does not once lose his cool. We also renew the acquaintance of Anita from the VIP Suite, and Michele, the cheery trouble-shooter of Terminal Three.

How Buildings Learn BBC2, 8.00pm

Stewart Brand calls the penultimate programme of his stimulating series The Romance of Maintenance but he is being ironic. Maintaining buildings is not romantic. It means expense and hassle and there is nothing to show at the end. Yet. as Brand says, no maintenance can mean no building. He is not just talking about repairing leaks or tackling dry rot, but how such things can be avoided in the first place. His pet hate is the flat roof. He claims, perhaps with enaggeration, that flat roofs always let in water. On the positive side he urges the use of brick and wood, which age well and need little upkeen. To underline the point he shows us examples of 300-year-old weather-boarding in New England and bricks in the Italian town of Lucca which go back to Roman times.

Secrets of the Gobi Desert Channel 4, 9.00pm

Bill Paterson, who is also the voice over for Airport, narrates a tale of fossil hunting in the Mongolian desert. It is a rich field, particularly for the remains of dinosaurs. The film follows an expedition led by Mike Novacek and Mark Norell from the American Museum of Natural History in New York. Novacek and Norell are following in

The Envy of the World

Radio 3. 10.45pm

The first of the season's Proms to be shown on BBCI features The Gondoliers. It is some years since Gilbert and Sullivan were represented at the Proms but with Lernon and Macartney included for the first time it was logical to bring back their Victorian forerunners. A concert performance may not match a full theatrical staging. But with G and S the songs are the thing and it does not need elaborate sets and costumes to bring out the catchy melodies and witty lyrics. A tale of baby swapping kidnapping and mistaken identity. The Gondoliers was the pair's last important collaboration and played before Queen Victorial Tonight's cast has Jamie McDougall and Jason Howard in the title roles, with Richard Suart as the Duke of Plaza-Toro and Donald Maxwell as Don Alhambra.

Hitler reckoned without Pat Bing, Freda James and Commie Callum. He believed the Nazis' Enigma codes were unbreakable. Pat, Freda and Enigma codes were unbreakable. Par, Freda and Connie, plus some 10,000 others, were to give him a nasty shock. Sworn to secrecy and operating as independent units in Bletchley Park, Buckinghamshire—they never met their team-mates—they broke the Germans' naval codes, and down the line to Churchill's war cabinet bunker in London went the vital information without which the Second World War could have dragged on for years. Going Back tells what happened when, over 50 years later, Pat, Freda and Connie returned to Bletchley's huts, swapped memories and an Enigma variation — gossip of a personal nature.

in last night's Inside Story (BBCI), is how so many people joined such a dud cult in the first place. Not only was there no guarantee of constant sex—and, let's be honest. the general impression in the noncult world is that membership of creepy, quasi-religious cults brings dothes designer lean Paul with it the sexual equivalent of Gantier, which may explain those unlimited trips to the salad bar, wend outlits the cult members all and that the higher up you are in wore for their communal death. If the cult's pecking order the more they had met their end while Little Gern lettuces you get to dressed in conical Gauttier bras Little Gem lettuces you get to munch - sex was actually banned. The other mystery is how much its white haired leader, Marshall. Applewhite, resembled the impish and tartan skirts, it would at least have shown that they had some ee-Ann Wolf, former disciple, recalled how: "We used I to joke in class that we were the cuit of cuits. We weren't here to be programmed or brainwashed. We were here to beg to be brainwashed." They soon learnt that one thing worse than wanting something is genting it. Michael remembered how everything was done to a formula. You were not to come with 'Well, I'm gonna make the pancakes this big'. There was a mixture, a size, how long you cooked it on one side, how much the burner was on, how many a person got . . . to the point where the males — I shaved — were not to go up with the razor, only down." It came as no surprise to learn that offences included "trusting my own judgment, or using my own mind". And they had ways of whipping you into line. Enemas and "special purges" must have been persuasive. One favourite was called the "Master Cleaner",

pepper and maple syrup. I mean. you wouldn't even shoot that up a dog's backside. Even if it let you. You can't help wondering if Applewhite spent years giggling to himself and telephoning all his pals late at night and saying. They, Bill, listen to this. You know I told you I got some of the guys to thop off their own walnuts? Well I've just squirted two gallons of lemonade and cayenne peoper up their backsides and there wasn't a peep out of a single one of them. I figure maybe next week I'll tell them that we must all pass on to the 'level above human' by committing mass suicide."

So you can't blame the Meaders - whose daughter Gail joined Applewhite in January's ascent to the "level above numan" — for thinking that the tragedy was "one suicide, 38 murders". Their daughter lives on in an Ansafone tape recording of the one phone call she made to her parents, warning them she would "probably never" come home again. You felt guilty eavesdropping on such grief.

Dad: "Hi! Howyadoin? Jeez. we miss you Gail. We don't know what you're doing. We're worried about you. How about coming up for a visit? Ah, you can't be that busy. I'll buy you a ricket. We wanna see you. You can't be that busy you can't see your family." Ma: "Are you eating well? First chance you get come home for a visit. Bye. Love you. Click. Michael, Lee-Ann, Gail - all plausible human beings; intelligent, happy. That's what made this film so chilling.

trangely, earlier in the evening, TW Time Machine (BBCl) — a summer series which wants to bring a not-sobreathless nation up to date on some of the inventions Tomorrow's World has unveiled over the past 33 years - was itself interrupted by a ghostly, silhouetted vision of a white-haired cult leader, a man who has spawned several proselytising disciples. It turned out to be Raymond Baxter, come to see how his current frontmen -Maggie Philbin and Howard Stableford - are faring. On this

"Master Cleaner" (with double cayenne) if they don't find a snappier way of camouflaging this collage of archive clips.

Patrick Macnee, now an expatriate in Palm Springs, told us on One Foot In The Past (BBC2) that he wants to be buried in Bosham, the pretty Sussex seaside village where he used to recuperate in the 1960s between filming episodes of The Avengers, It was in Bosham that King Canute once ordered the tide to turn back. Here, too, that Harold, who later bought an arrow through the eye at the Battle of Hastings, set sail to make peace with William of Normandy. Maybe it will be here that Avengers fans will one day gather to pay their respects to Steed as the harbour fills with the sound of Macnee and Honor Blackman singing Kinkv Boois. It was an unlikely hit when re-released in 1989; OK. perhaps not in Bosham.

England need to seize initiative

Last chance to keep Ashes dream alive

By Alan Lee, cricket correspondent

EIGHT years ago, Michael Atherton made his Test match debut against Australia at Trent Bridge. He was out for nought and England were crushed by an innings and 180 runs. This was character-building stuff, instructive preparation for the tormented route that was to lead him back to where it all began and to this most critical moment in

The greatest desire that Atherton brought to the England captaincy in 1993 was that the Ashes should be reclaimed, the years of subservience to Australia ended. This summer provided his better chance, but it will have come to nothing, along with all the good intentions of his leadership, unless England can win the corresponding fifth Test, which starts in Nottingham today.

The signs are not propitious. Yesterday, while the unchanged Australians strutted their stuff with everinflating confidence, England lost their most effective bowler, Darren Gough, to a knee injury. They are now contemplating a shift in strate-gy by including two spin bowlers for the first time in the series, a move that could delay of Ben the introduction

If Atherton seeks solace, he could do worse than reflect on his own debut, made when things were infinitely worse. England were in turmoil that August, with David Gower close to resigning as captain and team selection apparently being conducted through a revolving door. Another player to make his debut at Trent Bridge that day was a black fast bowler, muscular and distinctly wayward. He took one for 166 and was famously referred to by the chairman of selectors, Ted Dexter, as Malcolm Devon. Thanks to Gough's injury.

Tufnell's turn? County reports Record total ...

Devon Malcolm could also be back where he started this morning, though he and Atherton will pray for a somewhat different agenda.

At the close of the first day in 1989, Australia were 301 for no wicket. The opening stand eventually realised 329 and when the present coach, Geoff Marsh, was out, the present captain, Mark Taylor, went on to make 219, still the highest score of his Test career.

Something similar today would be sufficient to puncture England's lingering optimism and settle the Ashes. For this reason. Atherton is preaching self-belief and, perhaps more importantly, trying to win the toss for the first time in five Tests.

Although Steve Birks, in his first season as groundsman, has injected more life into the previously moribund Trent Bridge square, Atherton will be anxious to bat first and dictate terms on what looks the best pitch of the series. His inclination to use both Croft and Tufnell also relies heavily

"It is definitely an attractive option here," he said. "I have been keen to do it all summer, but conditions have not been right. We have had a seamerfriendly season, but, in New Zealand last winter, I felt that the two spinners gave me a greater degree of control."

Gough's withdrawal, with a condition that threatens to end his series, is a disincentive. because picking both spinners will leave England with either a thin seam attack or an alarmingly long tail. As Mal-colm cannot be trusted as one of two fast bowlers, his inclusion would mean the younger Hollioake misses out and the tail begins at No 7. Otherwise, Hollioake minor would have to play as third seam bowler, a heavy responsibility even for such a self-possessed teenager.

The ballyhoo around Ben shows no sign of abating. Yesterday, he was photo-graphed with Brian Close standing over him in a grandfatherly way. Close, thus far the only teenager to have ved Test cricket for Eng land, had played 15 first-class games before his debut, scored more than 600 runs and taken 66 wickets. Hollioake's figures are 11 games, 422 runs and 21 wickets. On experience alone, he is England's greatest gamble, but the first of four capacity crowds would regard his exclusion with dismay.

Di Canio promises nothing but best for Wednesday

> By IAN WHITTELL AND RUSSELL KEMPSON

PAOLO DI CANIO yesterday became Sheffield Wednesday's record signing and immediately set about improving his image in the eyes of British football. The talented, but often unpredictable, Italian striker leaves Celtic after a much-publicised rift.

He completed the £4.5 million transfer yesterday and assured his new manager. David Pleat, and the Wednesday supporters that there will be no repeat of the unrest that marred his career north of the border. "I loved Cettic and I loved their fans, but some times a love affair has to end," Di Canio said. "I wanted to stay, but I had to think about my future.

I am happy that all of my problems with Celtic are now behind me and I can look forward to a good season with Sheffield Wednesday. I can promise that my attitude will be 100 per cent in every game and in every training session and I will sacrifice myself for the club because I love the sport."

Ole Gunnar Solskjaer. Manchester United's Norway striker, who expected to be sidelined for six weeks because of injured ankle ligaments, has been pencilled in to make a rapid return in Nor-way's World Cup qualifying game against Finland on Au-gust 20. One player whose career at Old Trafford will not progress further, at least for the time being is Dante Poli. The 22-year-old centre half from Chile returned to South America yesterday after failing to earn a contract with United after a two-week trial. Alex Ferguson, the United manager, said: "He is flying home, but will maybe come back in a year. He is only young and he has impressed us while he has been here."

SALLY GUNNELL and Colin Jackson, who were denied the chance two years ago to defend the hurdles world titles that they had won with world records in 1993, experienced contrasting fortunes yesterday in their attempts to regain them. Gunnell withdrew injured, but Jackson looked in his best form for three years and able to challenge for a medal this evening at the world championships here.

Gunnell declined to say whether this, the third international championship in succession in which she has been cursed by injury, pointed to retirement. "I still do not know about the rest of my career." Gunnell, 31, said. "I will make a decision at the end of the Battle of wounded knee gives Clinton slim gain FROM IAN BRODIE

IN A serious blow to latenight television comedians, President Clinton has become America's First Slimmer. Mr Clinton, formerly known as Tubby or Chubby or worse, is committed to reducing waist, his own.

When Mr Clinton tore his knee muscle last March, he was warned that most middleged men recovering from such an injury put on 20lb or more through inactivity. Not me, said Mr Clinton.

With the fervour he brings to winning elections, he threw himself into a daunting regime of diet and exercise. He swam a mile every other day in the White House pool. He worked out twice a day with two trainers from the US Navy. He lifted weights and pedalled a stationary bicycle for hours with his good leg. He cut his food intake to 1,500 calories a day, with no break-fast and lots of fruit.

Result: he has lost just over stone since March. When elected in 1992, Mr Climton weighed lost 2lb, the result of all the Big Macs and other fast food gobbled down along the campaign trail. Last year, he was down to 15st 6lb. Not skinny," said Mr Clinton, "but not so fat any more."

Now he is tipping the scales

"And I'm really not into hard-core girl bands with tattoos selling soul who allow themselves to be backed by big drink companies. We won't press man.

"No, there's no man in my life. Can't imagine I'd meet one who fits in with me. And I'm not the sort who can adapt. I mean, that's what women do. isn't it? They fit into a man's life. People have a hard time working me out. What did you

Eight years ago, Heather admitted herself to a Sussex clinic seeking treatment for an emotional disorder brought on by what was described at the time as a personality identity crisis.

I'm fine now, sorted myself, had to empty what was inside my head and focus on a higher energy. I was on a quest to find my own individuality. It's not something you can go into a shop and ask for, and I needed to know. Living up to other people's expectations can cause such stresses. You wonder, 'Am I doing this for me or because it's expected of me?"

"As a child, I was always the quiet one sitting in the corner. questioning everything. When I toured with my parents I'd be aware that there were some people who could just pick up the phone and demand a backstage pass, while others. the kids, queued all night for tickets. It was their energy that fired me, interested me."

Heather, 34, the daughter of Paul's wife, Linda, and her first husband, the American geologist Melville See, was born in Arizona and brought up in England. When she was five her mother met and married Paul, who subsequently adopted Heather.

Paul and Linda then had three children of their own, all of whom have found success in their various niches. Mary. 27. has followed her mother into photography and has already enjoyed the distinction of having a picture accepted by the National Portrait Gallery:

Stella, 24, is now based in Paris as head designer of Chloë, and James, 20, has made his debut as lead guitarist on his father's latest album, Flaming Pie.

Heather's unworldly lack of cynicism doesn't mean she hasn't been fitted with essential protective device that keeps her on the alert when questions touch on family matters, although she does confirm that her mother has made a full recovery from breast cancer.

"She's all right now," she says. "Like a plague, isn't it? Affects everyone in the

"I mean, what do they think's going on? That I've got it made? That I just ring home for the next £10,000 once a week? Well, I've got what I've got and I have to live within my own budget.

"we washed up in kitch-ens, worked in a pub. We were sent to state schools, so it's all very real in our family. Course, my folks would help me out if I was in real trouble. From what I can gather, even ordinary, working-class people do that anyway, give their children their last fiver."

Heather admits her own exploits have tested her par-ents faith. Seven years ago, I spent a year in Arizona and Mexico, staying with relatives. I met these amazing young people living on the streets, supporting themselves by stringing beads and playing the flute. They had nothing, and I really respected their values. They were happy even though they had nothing. Through them, I met what I call the First Nation people of America, the Tarahumara and Huichol people. They've become my major project. because their culture is in danger of extinction. I lived with them, learnt from them, got inspired by their pottery, their vulnerability. They rebeing bulldozed out of their lands. Now I want to do whatever's possible to save them, to help them survive the modern world.

"I'm really serious about the Huichol tribes. I'm not on some whim, it's not as though-I'm going through this week's craze. People might have a certain picture of me because of my name, would not imagine some of the heavy situa-tions I got out of in Mexico. Lord knows how I made it out in one piece. I guess I owe my common sense to my parents. They re the people who put me on the right road, otherwise I could have ended up in God knows where. "I mean, in Medico it wasn't a case of ringing my parents and asking for an air ticket. I know people find that hard to believe, but I made it through without once picking up a phone and asking my folks to help me out."

Clearly. Heather has inherited Linda's evangelistic fervour Hunting through a flowery cotton bag, she announces she wants to read from the journal she kept during her Mexican travels. "Won't take long," she in-sists. "I just want you to hear some of the things I wrote down. This will explain my interest in pagan ways and nature's cycles." Caring desperately that it honour her discovery of these native Americans, and her leans across to plead. "They are my project. Do you understand? They're standing on the edge of extinction and it's something I found out on my own. It's what I did by myself." She pauses. "You listened to

'CJD could become a disaster of biblical proportions'

only 27 when she died eight months after showing the first signs of what could be newstyle Creutzfeldt-Jakob's disease (CJD).

The diagnosis is still to be confirmed: this can only be achieved with certainty after tests have been carried out on brain tissue, which has to be collected either at the postmortem or obtained by surgi-cal biopsy during life. Although the tests are compararively straightforward, any brain biopsy carries with it a risk and is not readily undertaken.

The relatively low number of cases of new-style CJD.

which is the type of the disease related to BSE in cartle, have resulted in a great sense of relief. People are able, once more to enjoy their T-bone steaks and ossobuco without fear that every mouthful could give them a disease that would leave them demented and paralysed.

At last the Government, British farmers and veterinarians have the BSE epidemic under control and the beeteaters are probably right that it is now safe to eat British beef, and beef products. It would, however, be wrong for doctors and the general public to discount the possibility of a major epidemic of new-style CJD. Nobody will know for many years, probably at least ten, how many people have been affected by eating infected beef. This is one of only several questions that time alone will answer.

Evidence has, however, been garnered from the epidemic of kuru, another form of CJD, which wreaked havoc in New Guinea as the result of cannibalism. Research in New Guinea showed that the incubation period was about 12 years. Even last year, one person died from kuru, although cannibalism has been outlawed for nearly 50 years.

In the new-style CJD found in Britain, the intecting prion would, unike in New Guinupea, have to cross the species barrier from cow to human. Evidence suggests that this would double the incubation period and we are therefore looking at an interval of 20 to 30

If anyone were in a position to supply the answer to the mysteries of BSE and CJD, it would be Professor John Collinge, Professor of Neurogenetics at Imperial College. London, and St Mary's Hospital, the Wellcome Research Fellow at St Mary's and a consultant neurologist to the hospital St Mary's has the only specialist unit in the world investigating CJD. Professor Collinge is in charge.

Professor Collinge says: "I am now coming round to the view that doctors working in this field have to say what they think, even though this may give rise to anxieties which later turn out to be groundless. We have a heavy weight of responsibility to warn, but we have to be aware that what we say may be scary and could do irremediable economic damage. But it can no longer be denied that it is possible, even likely, that we may have to

It is impossible to predict the size of the epidemic — it may only involve hundreds. but it could be Europe-wide and become a disaster of biblical proportions. We have to face the possibility of a disaster with tens of thousands of cases. We just don't know if this will happen, but what is certain is that we cannot afford to wait and see. We have to do something. right now. We have to find the answers, not only to the questions of the nature of the disease, but to find a way to develop an effective treatment. Fortunately, it seems that this could be possible. Therapy is not just around the corner but we know how to target our research and, if it is given priority, we might have a treatment within ten years.

Everybody has prion protein, it is a normal constituent of the brain. There are normal and abnormal forms of this protein: CJD develops if there is an inter-reaction of the normal and abnormal prion protein. We need to develop a drug to prevent this interreaction and there is every likelihood that we will be able

Among the clinical prob-lems to be solved is the degree of vulnerability in children. Are children at special risk and is their apparently short incubation period an indication of this increased hazard? Nobody knows the answer.

but it seems possible that because children's central neryour system is growing rapidly, they make more prion protein, and this may increase their sensitivity to the infecting

Professor Collinge eats beef himself, and is confident that most of the infected material in British beef has now been removed. In any event, at his age, he would already have been infected. "At the time when the BSE epidemic was at its height. I was a junior doctor and eating junk hospital foods. including burgers. The hospital, or other cooking, would not have destroyed any prions responsible for CJD, and as I must have then been confronted by them, it would be illogical to avoid beef now."

Professor Collinge has no children, but says that if he had, he would be chary about giving them beef or beef products. The official line is that there is no evidence that children are at special risk, but as he explains: "This only offers limited reassurance. It means that there is an absence certain is afford to wait and of proven evidence that children are at particuthan there is evidence of an absence of risk." Professor Collinge is relieved that central nervous system tissue is now removed from the food chain and is amazed that it was imported from countries with BSE so long after it had been banned in Britain. "It was easy to avoid bovine brains, but to obtain the meat from around the spine, the cattle's vertebrae were crunched up and a pink paste of meat was produced. There was no sense in continuing to import beef products from countries in which BSE is now being diagnosed increasingly often."

t is not only the brain and the central nervous system that are rich sources of the BSE prion; research at St Mary's has confirmed that the lymphatic system also has an abundant supply of prions capable of causing CJD. The tonsils are part of the lymphatic system, and in an intected animal these, too, contain CID-producing prion pro-teins. There is now real concern in case there are numerous people incubating new-style CID, and if there are, whether their blood could carry the infective material. Tests are being devised to check this.

One unsolved problem of BSE in cause is why the lymphatic tissue of the calf's small gut is infectious, long before either its spleen or brain is capable of transmitting BSE. Fortunately, calves' guts are now removed from the human food chain, and do not even go into the humblest

There are three distinct types of CID. The inherited form accounts for 15 per cent of cases. This occurs all over the world. In Britain, there are now at least 30 families affected. It is inherited as an autosomal dominant characteristic, so that 50 per cent of those who have a parent who has the disease will develop the fullblown disease. This form usually strikes in the 40s and 50s. The second form of CJD is the most common. These are the sporadic cases, which are not inherited, although research at St Mary's has found that there are genetic markers. showing whether a person is conspiracy of silence in the search for a cure for CJD will cost lives.

says Dr Thomas Stuttaford

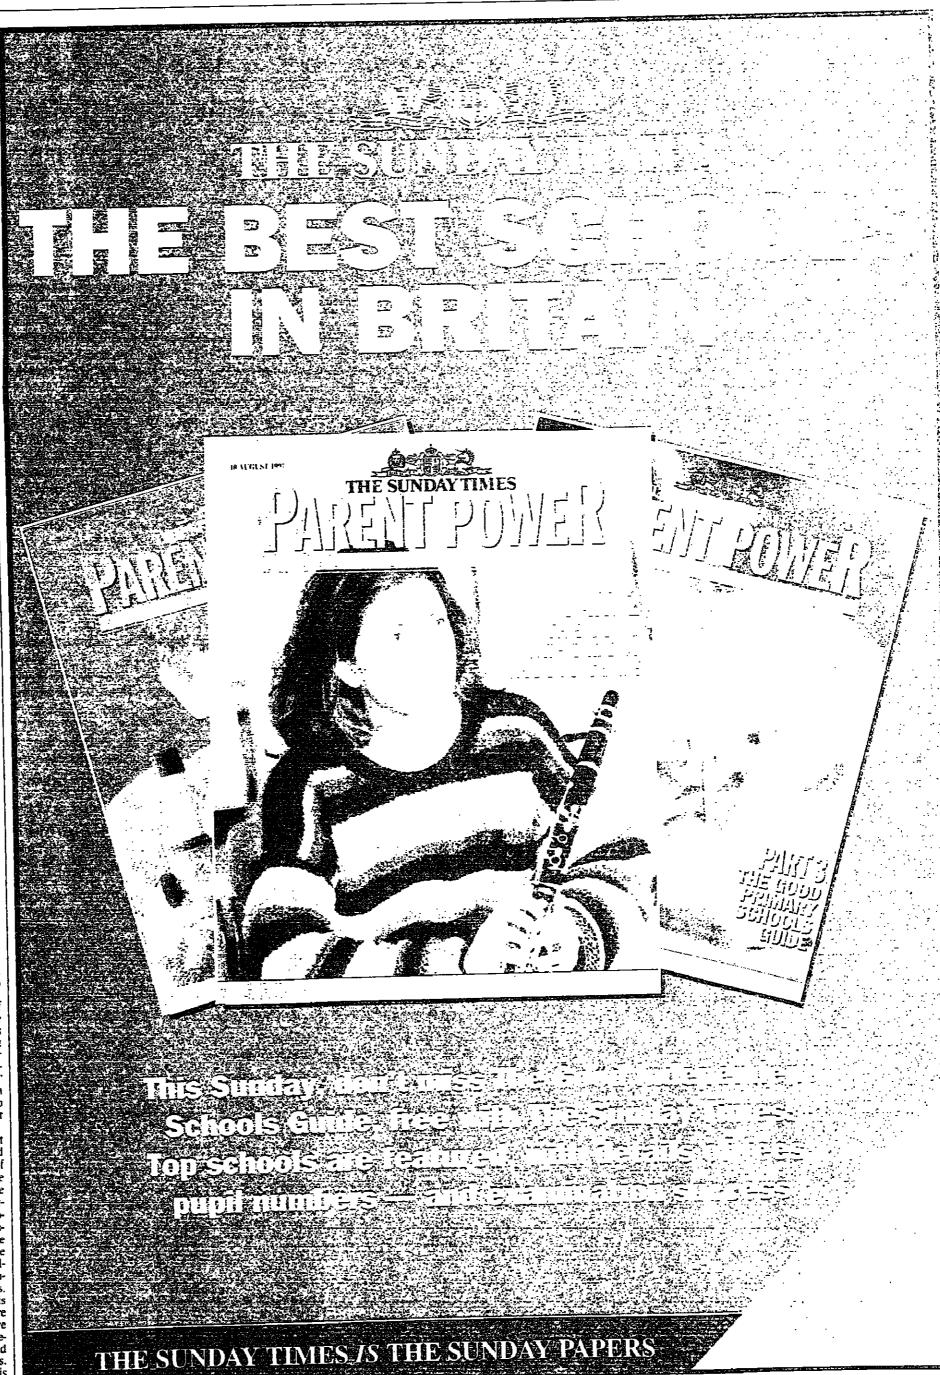

The third form of CJD is the acquired type and includes the new-style CID thought to be transmitted from BSE It seems probable that the case with which the infecting ugent is able to jump the species peel-eaters' genetic marketup. Another important unsolvesquestion is whether the reporfor beel-ener is at a greater of lesser risk man is burge resi-eater other from time to time may have had an institute.

The doubts and fears Profesour Collinge is now probag publicly are those which have been turned about behind closed doors in medical commen rooms and government sinces for more than tengeur. Political and commercial considerations have stiffed any public achate more than tracitional scientific rectifude

If Professor Collinge is right and there is still the risk of an epidemia, but hope of an effectthe treatment, any constitucy of spience will cost frees.

posed to be uphill struggles. Those involved in the process accept the journey from the trenches to the sunlit uplands has its inevitable hazards and slippages. What they will not accept is that their struggle is Sisyphean.

Since the Seventies, British ministers in Ulster have shown no more signs of learning from experience than the Greek condemned forever to shove a boulder up the steepest of gradients, only to have it roll back just as the summit came within sight. In Northern Ireland the same policy is pushed again, and again, but after all the honest effort the thing collapses, bringing violence in its wake, and we are back where we started.

It is in that sense that Mo Mowlam's meeting with Gerry Adams yesterday was genu-inely historic. It was not a breakthrough to a new era. but an eerie reiteration of policies past - history was not made, but re-enacted. The twin follies to which both parties have subscribed still

The strategy is driven by the tant republ will be persuaded they can achieve more by talking than killing. But all this attention, and adaption of policy, for a party with the support of oneeighth of Ulster's adults only reinforces the impression that the most persuasive advocates are the ones with

Armalites. That the same policies should guide governments for nearly 30 years, in defiance of logic and with a settlement no nearer, is difficult to comprehend. What makes it difficult to forgive is that their failure was prophesied, and the reasons for the failure analysed,

22 years ago. T. E. Utley's Lessons of Ulster, published in 1975 and reissued this month, is a brilliant survey of British Goverriment policy towards Northern Ireland. For the reader, the freshness of Utley's prose is a treat, for the citizen the freshness of his argument

Utley realised a generation ago that no peace worth the name could be secured by attemping to broker a deal between two incompatible aspirations and no peace would come by trying to moderate extremists through granting them concessions. Long before Mo Mowlam became Ulster's latest Sisyphus the province had a Sybil who could foresee her failure.

Peter Utley was one of the finest Tory polemicists of the Seventies and Eighties. His rigour in thought was matched by an elegance of expression and generosity of manner which won him admirers in politics, but sadly not the influence over its course which was his due. His iournalism was produced not only in defiance of Establishment opposition but also his own blindness, both of which he bore with stoical grace.

Writing in The Times in 1988, shortly before his death, Utley addressed himself to the Pollyannas and Panglosses who had chided him for his negativism, the men who still ask that we should indulge their pretensions and "give peace a chance". "During all these years, I and others like me have been very discouraging to all initiatives and I have continually been told I am a cynic who should give them a fair chance', and that in spite of the fact I believed on all occasions that to give them such a chance would produce appalling consequences. The predict-happened and. when I have presumptously pointed this out, I have been told I am judging with hindsight. However, my shoul-ders, metaphorically speaking are broad, and it would seem a pity to interrupt the rhythm of this dance. After another decade of dancing around the truth it is still just as difficult for critics to be out of step. It is as heretical now to question the assumptions of the peace process as it was then to doubt the wisdom of the latest constitutional "initiative".

t appears all the more L worst when Ulster enjoys a sort of peace thanks to the IRA ceasefire. But the last ceasefire was not a step on the road to an honourable settlement, simply a tactical suspension. The mugger, having administered a punch, asked for the wallet and when the fumbling went on for too long the blows started again. Why should we believe that this time will be different? While it is a mercy that republican terrorists are not currently pursuing their murder campaign, there is still no reason to believe that the armed struggle will not be resumed if Sinn Fein does not get what it wants from talks. And what Sinn Fein wants the end of the Union - cannot be given by a Government committed to uphold the democratic wishes of the greater number in Ulster. Perhans one day a Government will bend all its efforts to defending that democratic majority's clearly expressed wishes and treat Northern Ireland as fully part of the United Kingdom. As Utley wrote, in 1975: "By bloody and unnecessary experiments almost all policy have been exhausted." And yet, exhausted, still they

Cricket's decline and fall

ixty years ago we used to go as a family in August to watch the cricket at Westonsuper-Mare. Quite often it rained: I can recall the feeling of growing despair as it became certain that the outing would have to be cancelled. In 1934 my father had bought a second-hand open green Lagonda, itself a Depression car which had been built in 1939 but sold to some Bristol merchant only in

We would put our belongings into the boot, including deckchairs in case all the chairs at the ground had been taken; we would carry a picnic lunch, mainly of ham sandwiches, and a Thermos flask of coffee. We would take out three pairs of family binoculars, one of them a German sniper's field-grey binoculars, a First World War souvenir, which gave a disturbingly sharp picture of a narrowly focused scene. My father used to wear a Panama hat; my sisters and I vore children's soft such as have recently become fashionable for some Australian slip fielders.

The Somerset county cricket team in those years before the war was a very fair county side; it usually ended in the middle of the championship, and had some England players including J.C. Farmer White, whose slow bowling puzzled the Australians. He took 13 wickets for 250 runs in 124.5 overs in the Adelaide Test of February, 1929; Wally Hammond made a century in each innings, but all of us Somerset supporters believed that it was J.C. White who had won the match. Somerset in the 1930s had the medium-fast bowling pair of Arthur Wellard and Bill Andrews, and that forceful but melancholy young bats-man Harold Gimblett; his highest score for England was only 67 not out but he broke county records with some frequency, both for speed of scoring and for high scores.

Gimblett was a cricketer of moods: as an opening batsman he would sometimes plod about gloomily for a quarter of an hour until there was an inevitable snick to the slips or the wicket-keeper but sometimes he would hook the first ball for six and play the first over as though he had already made a century or more. We saw great batsmen from other counties and other countries playing against Somerset. I saw Hammond make more than one century at the Bristol ground, where GloucesterIf the Roman Empire failed its final test, what chance has Lord's?

shire usually won the local derby. I saw Paynter and Washbrook put on an 100 opening partnership, proba-bly before lunch, at Weston itself. I saw Donald Bradman make a double century at Taunton. I shall always be grateful to the Somerset players of those years, who are now almost all dead, for filling a child's memory and imagination with such vivid play. I can still see the scene when Kent's Frank Woolley was bowling to Ar-thur Wellard at Wells; Wellard, for the second time in his career, hit five sixes in an over and was dropped on the boundary off the last ball.

Is it the same nowadays? Up to a point, it probably is. I'm sure that 10year-old boys still go back home after one-day matches thrilled by the run chase at the end. It is extraordinary how often in limited-over cricket the game does end with a couple of overs left eight wickets down and 15 runs to get. That, at least as far as excitement is concerned, is the perfect end to a game, and it is one which the fourday match very seldom produces.

Yet in other ways cricket is not the same. In the 1930s there was no television; one saw cricket live or one did not see it at all. There were radio broadcasts of Test matches, given by Howard Marshall for the BBC when the Test matches were in England, and by an anonymous Australian commentator on Radio Luxembourg when they were in Australia. As children, we used to get up early to listen to the last hour of the Australian series of 1936-37, when England won the first two Tests but Australia won the last three and took the Ashes. These broadcasts were sponsored by a cigarette company. Their jingle was: "Mine's a Minor, the ten smoke for intelligent folk, oh why won't you try one of mine?"

No television, no helmets, no bodyline bowling after Douglas Jardine's disgraceful Australian tour of 1932-33, no sledging, no white noses, no one-day matches, no covered pitches, far more opportunity for slow bowlers in first-class cricket; these were some of the differences between the county cricket of the 1930s and county cricket now. There were also the amateurs, many of them schoolmasters who were available to play county cricket only in August. Another difference was that grounds were full. Certainly at the Weston festival, one could not rely on getting a seat unless one turned up at least half an hour before the match. and the same was true at Taunton. Now the grounds are often full for the one-day game, but are more often half or almost wholly empty for four-day county matches.

What we did not realise in the 1930s was how brief the classic period of English cricket would prove to be. one tries to push the starting point of this classic period, one cannot really date it before 1880. That was the year of the first Test match played in England, at the Oval, and the first Test appearance of W.G. Grace, who scored 152 in England's first innings. The year 1880 is not all that long ago: in terms of British experience it belongs to modern

Lord MacLaurin's report which was published this week proposes a post-classical structure for English cricket. It is rightly based on the recognition that the classical period is over. Classical cricket has been killed by many of the different changes of modern life. The cricket of the 1990s no more resembles that of the 1950s than Parliament in the 1990s resembles Parliament in the 1950s. One can no more imagine Peter May wearing Disneyland pyjamas to caper about under the spotlights than one can imagine Winston Churchill, as Leader of the Opposition, wearing a baseball cap with his own name on it and plunging down a theme park

The modern age is in many ways preferable to the old. I do not myself feel nostalgic for the Nissen huts, buzz-bombs and occasional whale steaks of my adolescent years; but it was certainly different. The virtues of a long attention span, a scholarly approach to life and a sense of harmony are not high among the values of our age.

No doubt Lord MacLaurin is right. If first-class cricket is to survive, it must attract a large audience. His scheme, with its emphasis on the oneday game and exciting play-offs, seems quite likely to do that. Newspapers themselves stay with a declining audience at their peril; the Morning Post was the leading newspaper for classified advertisements for butlers. the Daily Herald in its last years was the leading paper in which to run a baked-bean campaign directed at old age pensioners in the North Eastwhere are they now? "Where's Troy and where's the Maypole in the Strand?" Cricket has to adapt to the new audience or die, and I do not want cricket to die - nor for that matter would I wish to see the demise of the Tory party, which faces rather

Yet one-day matches, under floodlights or by daylight, in pyjamas or white flannels, is not the same as the classic game of cricket, and does not produce all the classic skills. One-day cricket is halfway to baseball, a very good game, but one of short-term movement aimed at excitement and quick results. Part of the reason why Australia so often beats England in Test matches is no doubt that the Australian side is made up of Australians; they live more in the sun, are usually fitter and come from a more competitive culture. But part of the reason is that they have concentrated less on the limited skills of the one-day game. We nowadays usually do win the oneday matches, but they usually win the Test matches, and it is still the Ashes which have the prestige.

doubt if Lord MacLaurin's remedies can save the classic quality of English cricket, though rather think William Hague's may save the electoral future of the Tory party. Even to Mr Hague I would add a note of caution. Baseball caps are associated in the public mind mainly with Diana, Princess of Wales and Nick Leeson - it makes a mixed image and not necessarily an ideal one for British politics. Cricket is trying to find a post-classical balance, and that is always hard to achieve.

Edward Gibbon's Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire analyses the failure of Rome to find its stable post-classic synthesis. Where Rome has failed, why should we expect Lord's to succeed?

on the corruption of a Labour heartland ntil recently I did not know that you could still buy up local branch of the Labor. Party by bribing new members join it. Nor, indeed, had I ever hear of a party worker being forced a make a political statement with a gur at his head; or talked to a councillo who had spent the night crouches under his sofa because he thought h was about to be taken out by gangsters. But then, until recently had never been to Paisley. What is it about this once douc city, "famed alike for shawls and thread, for poverty and poets", in the words of a 19th-century rhymer, that has turned it into what the newspa pers now call "a town called malice" The sad death of Gordon McMaster MP for Paisley South, has lifted a corner of a very grubby curtain. I reveals an aspect of modern politics which most of us thought had gone out with the rotten boroughs. And shows that for all Tony Blan reforms, there is a yawning gap between the ideals of new Labour and the grim reality at its grassroots. Mr McMaster's suicide note, now with the Whips' Office, accuses two colleagues of fuelling his despair and driving him to his death. Both deny the charges, but no one doubts that the whispering campaign of which he complained was the culmination of some poisonous feuds over many years in the constituencies of Paisley North and Renfrewshire West.

My own experience goes back to 1995, when Irene Adams, MP for Paisley North, decided to put down a series of questions about drug-dealing and violence in the city. There had been a horrendous catalogue of assaults, intimidation and murder in and around Paisley, largely as a result of two gangs warring with each other over disputed territory. What concerned Mrs Adams and prompted her questions was the suggestion that some of their drug money was being laundered through a local job-creation scheme. It was funded both by Renfrew council and the Scottish Office, and it seemed possible that public money was being siphoned off by the underworld under the noses of local councillors. Mrs Adams and Mr McMaster who represented Paisley South — had worked closely with the police, and their inquiries had stirred up a hornets' nest among the gangsters One regional councillor told me he had been woken in the middle of the night by a car driving up to his front door and shining its headlights straight into his bedroom. He was convinced he was going to be killed.

T air-raising as some of this was, what struck me was the hostility and back-stabbing i encountered between different factions of the local Labour Party. Far from Mrs Adams winning support: from her colleagues for what seemed a principled cause, she was accused of using it merely to hang onto her seat. "She's posing as Joan of Arc," sneered a rival, "while the rest of us are made to look like gangsters." Resentment went back to the way she had won the nomination for Paisley North in the first place. A local branch secretary demanded that she be deselected, then recanted, saying he had made the statement only because someone had pointed a gun at his head in front of his 13-yearold daughter (his claim was never investigated). I heard evidence that local branches of the party had beez taken over by the simple expedient buying up new members — with activists paying their dues, some-times on a single cheque, then using them to vote our existing office holders. On one occasion the new membership was said to have been been recruited en bloc from an old people's home.

Three inquiries held by Strathclyde council failed to amass enough proof. and there seemed a reluctance to take matters any further. Worse, a Scottish Office report into the possible misuse of government money has still not been completed two years on-Meanwhile, things have deteriorated. Last year, the entire Paisley Central Labour branch was be suspended after a local councillor put himself forward for election despite not being included on the candidates' short-list. Now, after the McMasker, affair, yet another party inquiry ba been ordered. What seems to have happened under the long years of Lahout control is this: in a former working class area trade union influence has declined and there are few skilled manual workers to provide local candidates. As a result, politicians of real ability are hard to find. Without strong organisations, unscrupulous activists have found it easy to take over branches by packing them with new members. Small cliques can wield real power, and they are difficult to dislodge. At the same time the Labour Party in Scotland has dragged its feet disgracefully, unwilling to rock the boat in one of its heartland areas. If Tony Blair is serious about" cleaning up his party in Scotland, he has to take serious action in Paisley. The implications spread well beyond the boundaries of the city; who will want to stand for a brave new parliament in Edinburgh if they think that Labour politics is still bogged P.H.S that Labour politics is still beg

THERE is unrest in the potting-shed as Classic FM blows the whistle on Gardener's Forum, its answer to the BBC's Gardener's Question Time. In 1994, the commercial station took an elephant gun to the BBC by poaching its three GQT stars, Dr Stefan Buczacki, Sue Phillips and Fred Downham. The last Forum, however, is to be recorded at the National Amateur Gardening Show, in Shepton Mallet on September 6. The problem, it seems, is cost, The Cheltenham and Gloucester Building Society paid £400,000 to nurse the show through its early years. That sponsorship has now finished and Classic FM can no longer afford costly outside broadcasts from remote village halls.

Only the intervention of a local seed manufacturer saved the last broadcast. A cheaper phone in pro-gramme may replace it.

There is a nasty whiff of Schadenfreude at the BBC. Trevor Taylor, the producer of Gardener's Question Time says: "Programmes, like plants, only do well when they are firmly rooted. GQT is 50 years old this year and blossoming."

GERMAN GRIDLOCK

Kohl has never seemed less securely in control

taunt with which Theo Waigel Germany's Finance Minister, berated the opposition Social Democrats (SPD) this week for blocking his vaunted "ax reform of the century" retort that any Social Democrat missister who, after 15 years in power, had gouged unpluggable holes in the nations mances and let unemployment soar to fine weeks. new record of 4.396 million would be unceremoniously drummed out of office. It had home. Helmut Kohl's shoulders shook, but he laughed with everything but his eyes.

Herr Waigel's anger is understandable. Although the governing coalition will try yet again next month to cut a deal with the SPD, the package is almost certainly headed for the scrapheap, where it will moulder until after the September 1998 federal elections. The dispute has become a symbol of what the Finance Minister calls the "self-paralysis" of the German political system.

The point is that almost no German questions the organcy of overhauling the tax system, a regulatory jumble which encourages tax evasion, penalises investment, discourages potential employers and inflicts even on relatively modest earners top in-come taxes of 53 per cent. His plans for steep cuts in tax rates, financed by ending some of Germany's myriad tax loopholes and broadening the base, are on the right lines. The SPD justifies its veto on the ground that it is unaffordable; with tax revenues sagging as dole queues continue to grow, Herr Waigel's sums do not add up. But it is motivated by politics more than mathematics; inaction will, after all, mean more tax evasion and still higher unemployment and the SPD knows it. It also knows that for Herr Kohl, tax reform was his best hope of a supply-side boost to the economy in time for never seemed less securely in charge.

In Britain, "Germany's inability to reform is his bid for a fifth term. The Chancellor has greeted with mockery. The vertice is not wowed to hound the SPD for this through that of a Tory tenophobe this was the bitter every German village. In previous years, that would have been a formidable threat. But it is a measure of the Chancellor's weakening political grip that instead of blaming the SPD, business and voters tend in the Bundestat, the German parliament—to gite this fiasco as one more proof that the ary upper house which they control—coalition he heads has become tired, weak, From the SPD benches came the part—duarrelsome and incompetent. A third of the voters within his own Christian Democrat Party say that the SPD's Gerhard Schröder would make a better Chancellor.

Herr Kohl has recovered from previous bouts of unpopularity; but he is vulnerable to the SPD charge that after 15 years in power, a Government that complains about Germany's lack of reform should look in the mirror. The truth increasingly recognised is that Herr Kohl is part of the problem, because Germany's postwar "social market" model fits him like a comfortable old glove. While the immediate cause of Germany's economic difficulties is unification - still costing around £44 billion a year - well before 1990, the engine of Rhenish capitalism was already sputtering.

Herr Kohl promised Germans less government when he was first elected in 1982. He has done too little, too late. State subsidies are still independently estimated at £100 billion a year, privatisation and deregulation is only now being tackled and Herr Kohl has done no more than tinker with a social security system that adds an unaffordable 41.7 per cent to labour costs. His grand obsession. European monetary union, is at odds with Germany's present mood. Germany missed out on what should have been its reforming agenda for the 1980s; has paid dearly in the 1990s and, although the recession may be easing in the western Lander, ends the 20th century less certain of itself than at any time since Weimar In Europe, Herr Kohl still plays the man of destiny; but at home, he has

THE GAP TRAP

Deferred entry students deserve some sympathy

There are few more familiar features of erally initiate their own tuition charges. August in this country than examination Although Mr Blunkett took the least bad results and the subsequent annual struggle for university admission. Those who have fallen short of their required A-level marks and others who have surfassed their initial. expectations enter that mysterious market known as the clearing process. Despite regular threats of chaos and collapse this students with courses. The strain may be rather more intense on this occasion.

As we have reported over the past two days, the emergence of "the gap trap" may lead to record numbers of qualified applicants chasing a limited supply of places. The trap is a consequence of Sir Ron Dearing's report and decisions taken by David Blunkett. The Government's announcement. that it would introduce income-related tuition fees and abolish the remaining maintenance grant from October 1998 has a special impact on up to 26,000 prospective students. They applied for deferred entry well before the Dearing report was issued or Mr Blunkett spoke but now find themselves inside the new system. Large numbers have decided to seek a slot in October 1997 almost regardless of course or campus. This may swamp the fragile clearing mechanism.

While most observers had assumed that there would be a radical alteration in student finance they had also thought such a shift would not start until 1999. Had that been the case then the trap would not have materialised. The Education Secretary decided that the crisis in Britain's universities was so intense that 12 months' delay was impractical. His department knew that if the Government did not act, large numbers of cash-strapped institutions would unilatdecision it still leaves thousands of students in an invidious situation.

They applied, were offered, and then accepted conditional places expecting one set of funding rules and have found themselves faced with another. It would be a distortion of the clearing procedure — which is primarily designed for those left without places if these belated applicants removed others from higher education. It would also seem a breach of natural justice - and possibly of statute law - if those who sought deferred entry in 1998 were to suffer financial penalty.

It is especially unfortunate that the effect should be felt by those who chose to take a 12-month break between school and university. Tutorial opinion has swung strongly to the view that, provided the time is used in a stimulating fashion, the year out has considerable educational value. In the future larger numbers may well take up this option, not least to raise money to support themselves during their study. It would be a poor precedent if deferred entry carried the risk of being caught by a switch in Whitehall policy.

Mr Blunkett should consider compromise rather than risk chaos during clearing this month and then confrontation in the courts afterwards. The total numbers affected are rather small compared with the entire university intake. The Government should retain the previous funding arrangements for these students if they start their course in 1998 as scheduled. This will, admittedly, create another anomaly. Transitions by their very nature involve some inconsistencies. But it would be unwise for Mr Blunkett's brave new world to start with an act that will strike most people as at odds with basic fairness.

SOUR GRAPES

There is no excuse for the appalling quality of wine in pubs

Age has not improved the wine sold in one of the world's most open markets, a Britain's public houses. Ten years ago Which? magazine investigated pub wine and found that far too much was unpleasant and overpriced; a decade later it is just as undrinkable, and the palates of tasting inspectors were so offended that they spat out their criticism as fast as the plonk that they were served. Beer is the staple of British inns, and for generations pints of the foaming liquor quenched the thirst of country yokels and urban workers alike In England, spirits were admitted later, as Scottish and Irish elixirs began to establish a fondness for whisky and whiskey; gin, too, became a fast route to inebriation — though the drink that once was consumed in Victorian gin palaces now boasts far better-heeled devotees among the yachting set and the home counties. But wine, with its dangerous associations of Confinental morals, hedonistic abandon and rampant snobbery, was never welcome. Men who were men did not drink wine; their wives, if admitted, might be allowed, perhaps, a glass of port. But publicans. lugging beer barrels from dray to cellar, had neither time nor patience to quibble about vintages. The Chardonnay and Firkin has never caught on as an inn sign.

But mine host is, for once, unusually out of step with the regulars. Britons have started drinking wine in enormous quantities. With supermarket explosion in New World offerings and a holiday culture largely dependent on quantities of Rioja, it is not only city sophisticates and fevered poets who long for a "beaker full of the warm south". A glass of white wine is increasingly part of the pub round. And those pubs that aspire to stardom in gourmet guides find that as demand for home cooking rises, so too does the desire for an elegant glass of Pouilly Fumé or some nice Australian Shiraz

It is at this moment that a pub's reputation is dashed. For however good the onion soup or prawn sandwiches, the chances are that the white wine will be warm and the red sour. Nor will it be cheap. Pubs charge as much as restaurants for wine and their profit margins are enormous. There should be no difficulty is keeping wine chilled. Nor is ignorance any excuse. With the closure of dozens of local breweries, beer was in danger of becoming homogenised, and it took a spirited campaign by real ale devotees to bring back the hand-pulled, hop-rich pint The problem, it seems, is that landlords are still fied to their suppliers, and the breweries have an age old distrust of the grape. Only a few - the award-winning Adnams of East Anglia being a conspicuous example — take pride in both beer and wine. A drinker is illadvised to attempt both of an evening; but he should have a proper choice.

Army promotion and public schools

From Major-General P. M. Davies

Sir. Major Eric Joyce treport and photograph. August 4) is guilty of a sophism by inferring in his Fabian Society pamphlet that "blatant social selection" prevails in the Army's commissioned hierarchy.

Like the majority of my postwar contemporaries who joined the Army as a vocation. I was subjected to a vig-orous and testing selection process over 30 years to achieve senior rank. viz, as a National Service private soldier (1950), Unit Selection War Office Selection Board, Officer Cadet Training Unit, Regular Com-missions Board — all prior to entry to Sandhurst; by examination for promotion to captain and again to the Staff College: by examination for promotion to major and then to the National Defence College; and by selection board for entry to the Royal College of Defence Studies.

At no time in 30 years climbing the ladder was my school, Charterhouse, a rung, I believe. Of real importance, and subject to annual recorded assessment, was command and leadership potential, coupled with experience in operational theatres.

I fully support the present and widely used system of commissioning NCOs based on their ability, experience and potential: their contribution is outstanding.

Let there be no doubt, however, that the very highest ranks in the Army. which I did not achieve, are reached competitively only by those officers of superlative merit, competence and ex-perience. To suggest that they are just posh is sheer tosh.

Yours faithfully. PHILIP DAVIES, Vine Cottage, Fonthill Gifford, Tisbury, Wiltshire. August S.

From Captain Nigel Vinson (retd)

Sir, 1 believe it is eminently sensible, as suggested by Major Joyce, that Army officer and soldier recruiting be merged — until one considers the competing requirements.

Soldiers, while certainly encouraged to show a degree of initiative, should expect to be led by their senior commissioned and non-commis-sioned officers. Officers are required to be more flexible, determined and have a practical intellect, irrespective of the pressures placed upon them, whilst also maintaining a level of humanity so vital on peacekeeping missions. In short, they must lead by example, striking a balance between the application of reason, persuasion and, if absolutely necessary, force in order to achieve their goals.

Consequently, many officers such as myself (1991-97) attain a graduatelevel entry into the Army and came through the state school system. Some were former soldiers, having displayed the necessary qualities whilst in the ranks; others proved themselves canable by succeeding during the year-long training course at the Royal Military Academy Sandhurst.

Irrespective, many soldiers make excellent corporals and sergeants, with a firm grip on discipline and an uncanny ability to predict the next order and "get things done". Among these a few will attain a commission, yet not necessarily rise to the highest ranks. Why? Not because the Army does not recognise their experience or potential, or because of snobbery, but because each officer must reach a certain rank by a certain age bracket. Join the Army late, at 25-plus, or "lose" time as a soldier, and the key burdles to the attainment of higher rank cannot easily be overcome.

Ultimately the Army must possess a clearly defined hierarchy - the necessities of combat demand as much -but a more flexible attitude towards age and experience would more easily assist the passage of suitable soldiers into the officer structure and on to higher rank.

Yours faithfully, NIGEL VINSON (Duke of Westminster Royal United Services Institute for Defence Studies. Whitehall, SWL August 5.

From Mrs Fiona Chapman

Sir, My grandfather, Sir William Robertson, rose from private (1877) to field marshal (1919) in the British Army, when the class divides were enormous.

I believe that talent will make it through now more easily than it did in my grandfather's day.

From Captain David E. A. Michael

Sir. Has nobody yet told Major Eric Joyce that for very sound military reasons leaders have tended always to come from the "teeth arms" and that the best breeding ground for such is the public-school system?

Democratic socialism never has worked and never will. Major Joyce should stick to his rations and leave politics out of the Army.

Yours faithfully, D. E. A. MICHAEL. 68 Cheyne Court, Royal Hospital Road, Chelsea, SW3. August 5.

Local and global impact of increase in organic farming

From Mr Craig Sams

Sir, Michael Hornsby's report of July 29 on Britain's abysmal incentives to organic farmers included the usual superficial price comparison of organic food versus conventional pro-

The real cost of conventional food is not found on the supermarket till receipt but is hidden in water bills, tax bills and healthcare costs. One billion pounds have been invested by water companies in clean-up equipment, along with an annual $121 million water-cleaning cost to remove pesticides and nitrates from water, so that it can meet EU minimum standards.

The snaring level of food poisoning, with 93,000 reported cases in 1996 compared to 19,000 in 1985, is a cost to the National Health Service, not to the purchaser of factory-farmed meat. The common agricultural policy costs every UK household £20 per week. In 1983 organic farmers barried the feeding practices that led to BSE, a cost to the nation most recently estimated at £4 billion, and still rising.

Poisoning by pesticides is an occupational hazard for farm workers, particularly those who handle sheep dip. The NHS picks up the treatment cost, but the real cost is the waste of human potential. Genetic engineering of food, an attempt to industrialise the fundamental processes of nature, holds risks that only experience will enable us to assess.

If all these costs were diverted to the supermarket bill then market forces would do the rest.

Yours sincerely. CRAIG SAMS (Chairman), Whole Earth Foods Ltd. 269 Portobello Road, WII.

From the Chief Executive of the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds Sir, The RSPB has long argued that farmers should be supported for environmental, not production reasons. Increasing funding for organic farming would be one certain way of ensuring this is the case.

Many farmland birds such as the skylark and grey partridge have undergone drastic declines over the past 25 years, as have a wide range of invertebrates and plants. Research shows that organic farms are favoured by these birds and greater numbers can be found feeding and nesting there than on conventional farms. Not all farmers will wish to or be able to become organic. However, many of the principles underlying organic farming could be applied more widely to UK farming, with the accompanying benefits to wildlife.

Increasing payments to farmers to help them through the conversion period is one way to increase the number of organic farms in the UK.

The RSPB believes the lack of ongoing maintenance payments. which are already enjoyed by many other European countries and are funded through EU environment regulations, is a clear disincentive to many. Such annual payments are justified on the grounds that they reward farmers for the environmental goods they deliver.

If the Government is serious about its review of organic farming, it should set an ambitious target to increase the amount of land farmed organically in the UK to 5 per cent within the next five years.

Yours faithfully, BARBARA S. YOUNG, Chief Executive, The Royal Society for the Protection of Birds. The Lodge, Sandy, Bedfordshire.

Plight of detainees

From Dr M. Louise Pirouet

Sir, Mrs Annie Anderson (letter, August 1; see also letter, July 29) rightly holds that asylum-seekers should not be held in criminal prisons. To do so is contrary to the guidelines of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees, which state that, if for some exceptional reason an asylum-seeker has to be detained. then he should not be held with "common criminals".

But most asylum-seekers should not be detained at all. On July 17 this year the UNHCR's representative in the United Kingdom, Mr Philippe Lavanchy, stated in a speech that almost 900 asylum-seekers were then being detained in this country. He went on: The thousands of asylum-seekers so incar-

Rockall fisheries

From Commander M. B. F. Ranken Sir. Your report of July 28, "Britain is ready to give up Rockall", is based on a false premise. Rockall cannot sustain human habitation or economic life. Under the UN Law of the Sea Convention 1982, which comes into force in three weeks' time, it is therefore not entitled to an exclusive economic zone or continental shelf, but does retain a 12-nautical-mile territorial sea and contiguous zone.

No country has recognised the UK's claim to the 200-nautical-mile limits around Rockall, enacted to reinforce our annexation of the rock in 1955. Neither our fishermen (nor others entitled within the European Union) have been deterred from fishing there; nor should they be now, once we abandon the 60,000 square-nauticalmile segment to the west of Rockall. It remains to be seen whether many new entrants are attracted to this area by the rock's partial reversion to the high

Mineral rights on and below Rockall will remain unaffected. ## A tortuous new life for the Serpentine Gallery

BY DALYA ALBERGE ARTS CORRESPONDENT

ONE of Japan's leading avant-garde artists has constructed a skeletal wooden replica of the Serpentine Gallery, recycling doors and windows removed by workmen redeveloping the former 1930s teahouse in Kensington Gardens.

The installation, a ghostly structure playing with light and space that stands on the lawn outside the gallery, marks Tadashi Kawamata's first public exhibition in Britain. He has also created a variation on the theme at Annely Juda Fine Art in central London, disorientating visitors by placing some of the Serpentine's glass doors and windows horizontally to create a translucent structure. Although he does not usually show in commercial galleries, maquettes and studies for the installation will be for

The Serpentine noted: "Kawamata likes to work on building sites, allowing himself to be drawn into the cycle of demolition and construction part of a closed circuit of endless activity. His use of both new and recycled timber evokes the order of traditional Japanese architecture but his projects appear to be chaotic — as if struck by an earthquake and haphazardly rearranged."

Commenting on the inspiration of renovation programme to improve building-sites. Kawamata said yester-facilities and environmental controls. day: "It is the temporary nature that attracts me. The 'in-between', changing time and functions. Life is temporary. That's a philosophy for me." He encourages visitors to walk round his replica gallery, contemplating its "emptiness The old windows and doors, salvaged from a building which became a gallery in 1970, are being replaced with identical new ones double-sealed to create an air-controlled environment. In 1996, the gallery - whose exhibitions have ranged from Andy Warhol to Damien Hirst — embarked on a major facilities and environmental controls. It will reopen in November.

Kawamata, born in 1953, studied painting at Tokyo's National Univerity of Fine Arts before turning to site specific installations in the late 1970s. He has created projects world-wide, most recently for the Venice Biennale, and often interweaves wooden structures with existing buildings and their structures.

☐ The Serpentine show runs from tomorrow until September 7 while the exhibition at Annely Juda Fine Art, 23 Dering Street, London, WI, runs from tomorrow until September 13.

He compared this with the data on 338 teeth from 54 of our own ancestors who lived between 40,000 and 10,000 years ago.

"Significant differences in attrition are few," he reports in the Journal of Archaeological Science, but those that do exist are found in the front deciduous (or baby) teeth, which in A N Caffell - MOD Abbeywood, 4/8/97; J Izzard the anatomically-modern human (AMH) children "were HQLC Wyton, 4/8/97: M E J markedly more worn" if the Render - MOD(EP) - 9/8/97 two sets of children matured at

Archaeology

Do baby teeth hold the sharpest clue to why Neanderthal man died out?

By Norman Hammond, archaeology correspondent

If the Neanderthal and AMH diets were similar in content and chewiness - a factor possibly affected by the invention of soups and stews in one direction, and by drying or smoking meat for storage in the other - then the greater degree of wear on the AMH children's teeth may well have been caused by longer exposure to solid food, in other words, by weaning earlier in life. "The advent of dental attrition very likely signals the introduction of solid foods and initiation of weaning, abrupt or gradual," Dr Skinner says. Removing a child from the breast hastens the resumption of ovulation, by suppressing production of the hormone prolactin. This may have led to more frequent pregnancies in AMH females, which would in turn have favoured accelerated weaning of the current child to make room for

There is, on the other hand. no advantage to early weanearlier loosening of motherchild bonds, and dietary stress for the weaned infant are all deleterious effects, so that any acceleration should be regarded as unintentional. But such accidents have unforeseen consequences, and "profound demographic and social changes ensue from reduced birth spacing." Dr Skinner Among the effects of this plausible mechanism are a rapid increase in AMH population and family size, leading to more efficient hunting units but also to more pressure on the resources of the Ice Age landscape. A combination of more potent opposition and a reduction in prime foods and living spaces available to the Neanderthals could well have resulted in the fragmentation and eventual extinction of their society suggested by other recent research (The Times, January 2, 1997).

BRIGADIER DENIS ESMONDE-WHITE

Brigadier Denis Esmonde-White, CBE. MC and Bar, formerly the Army's director of work study, died on July Il aged 81. He was born on June 20, 1916 was while serving as a forward observation of ficer with artillery units in the Second World War that Denis Esmonde-White work his Military Crosses. In 10 f in Eritrea in the Horn of Airica he braved heavy fire to reach his observation post and direct his battery's guns on to the Italian artillery, which was inflicting heavy losses on the British infantry. His second Military Cross was awarded three years later, in France, when he set up an observation post well in front of his own troops. From it, he guided the guns onto an advancing German column. until the leading enemy tank was less than fifty yards away and his radio was smashed by a direct hit.

His commanding officer put his name forward for a VC, and the commendation was tuesed down only because were so many similar acts of heroism and selfsacrifice at that time, as the Allies pushed forward across North-West Europe. Esmond-White went on to serve in the Far East, where he was mentioned in dispatches during the fighting in Burma.

But perhaps the greatest test of his courage came ten years after the war, when he was posted as military assistant to Montgomery, who in the mid-1950s was deputy supreme allied commander at Nato military headquarters in Versailles.

Esmonde-White had been warned that he would not get t'-sjob, and that his name was in fact being put forward for interview just to make up numbers. With little to lose, therefore, he strode in to see the great man and boldly started to cross-question him about his command and appointments in the Western Desert.

To his amazement, Montgomery's reaction was simply to march him towards a wall map and begin a half-hour explanation of his more controversial decisions. At the end he turned to his stimmed oneman audience and barked: o'clock sharp."

sake, Esmonde," (he never used the full surname) "can't you stop jumping up and Esmonde-White fitted a a button beneath his desk which would open the door automatically when he heard the familiar footsteps, while he continued to work, head down, at his desk. Monty was They developed a great mutual regard and respect, which continued for many years. 'Montgomery discovered that Esmonde-White's son shared "Right, start on Monday, 9 his own hirthday (November 17), and the two birthday boys complained: "For Heaven's He also insisted on taking the first look at the junior Esmonde-White's Eagle comic when it arrived at the office. Esmonde-White himself prepared the maps for Montgamery's memoirs, receiving in return an inscribed copy

acknowledging the author's indebtedness. But his greatest reward came in 1957, when, on leaving the Field Marshal's office, he received a glowing report from the victor of El Alamein. His military assistant had proved a "high-class staff officer", it said, and merited immediate command of a gunner regiment to open the way to Esmonde-White (whose first name was pronounced the French way) was born in a Normandy château belonging to an aunt and uncle. He spent his childhood and early schooldays in France, mostly at his uncle's apartment in Nice, where the family mingled with the cosmopolitan society of the Riviera Esmonde-White's godmother was the morganatic widow of Tsar Alexander II (who was murdered in 1882). He came to Britain to go to school at the Imperial Service College, from where he went on to the Royal Military Denis Carlo Basil Luke missioned into the Royal Artil- officer.

lery in 1936, he passed out top of the young officers' course at

When he turned 21 the French Army sent him his callup papers. Only the intervention of the British consul in Rouen saved him from being branded a deserter.

He served for some years in India, where he developed a passion for polo. Returning there after the war he attended the staff college at Quena. In 1952 he was commanding a battery in Kenya at the time that the young Princess Eliza-beth succeeded to the throne while en route to Australia with the Duke of Edinburgh. His battery fired the first official salute of the Queen's reign, and Esmonde-White had the first cartridge case made into an inkwell, which was then presented to her.

He commanded an antiaircraft regiment in the Isle of Wight after leaving Montgomery's staff, and this enabled him to indulge his other great sporting passion: sailing. The Royal Artillery's yacht, the Si Barbara, was then berthed at

He rose to become deputy director of the Royal Artillery at Woolwich. Then in 1967 he began his last job, as the Army's director of work study responsible for advising units on how to increase efficiency.

He retired in 1971, and spent much of the rest of his life on his own yachi, crossing the Channel 150 times and venturing as far as Spain. He took great pride in his election to the Royal Yacht Squadron.

He was a rall man, built somewhat larger than life, and a highly articulate professional, never afraid of telling his superiors what he thought. This may have been why he did not advance quite so far in the Army as had once seemed possible. He had a dry, irreverent sense of humour, and it was said that young subordinates who took their problems to him always came away laughing - their burdens lightened at least temporarily. He met his wife Pat in Egypt in 1941. She was running the International Girl Guides unit there and asked the local regimental commander to send along a young officer to test them in map reading. #### CHUCK WAYNE

Chuck Wayne (right) with Barbara Carroll and Clyde Lombardi

Chuck Wayne, American iazz guitarist, died in lackson. New Jersey, on July 29 aged 74. He was born in New York on February 27, 1923,

CHUCK WAYNE was one of a handful of talented guitarists who helped to define a new role for their instrument at a crucial time in the history of

Until the beloop revolution of the 1940s, the guitar had tended to be restricted to a predominantly rhythmic function, in both large and small jazz groups, with soloists emphasising the instrument's chordal possibilities. As the 1940s dawned, however, and following the experiments in amplification which had been pioneered by Eddie Durham and Charlie Christian, guitarists became able to emulate the solo melody lines of saxophonists or trumpeters by playing amplified sequences of single notes.

Wayne was among the pioneers of this new style, contributing to influential recordings by Sarah Vaughan and Dizzy Gillespie in 1944-45, and demonstrating that the guitar had an entirely different voice in 1940s jazz from what had gone before.

grant family, and his first instruments were the balalai-ka and mandolin of his European heritage. He became a talented player of most instruments of this type, even at one point recording an album on the hanjo.

The guitar was the logical choice of instrument when he decided to play jazz, and he soon found work with small groups led by Clarence Profit and Nat Jaffe. Like so many other New Yorkers, he gravitated to 52nd Street, where numerous jazz clubs offered plenty of work, and he ended up playing in the group at the Hickory House led by the traditional clarinettist Joe Marsala. However, Marsala was also open to new ideas in jazz (once hiring Dizzy Gillespie for a recording), and Wayne was able to absorb the new language of beloop during the time he spent on The Street" from 1944 to 1946.

At the prompting of the British critic Leonard Feather, he took part in one of Sarah Vaughan's earliest recording dates, and soon afterwards played in Dizzy Gillespie's sextet for the definitive records Blue 'n Boogie and Groovin'

This was followed by a period playing with Phil Moore at the Café Society, invitation to replace Billy Bauer in Woody Herman's big hand. In this band, Wayne contributed to many now famous recording sessions, among them Raiph Burns's Summer Sequence and Early Autumn.

After leaving Herman's hand. Wayne led his own group for a while, until Leon-ard Feather introduced him to the pianist George Shearing. Shearing had just split up from the clarinettist Buddy De Franco, and Feather suggest-ed that he hire Wayne and the vibraphonist Marge Hyams to create a new sound. The results were immensely successful, and the association lasted from 1949 to 1952, in what became Shearing's bestknown quintet.

Thereafter, Wayne went on to balance lucrative studio and television work on the Carol Burnett and Ed Sullivan shows, with jazz and cabaret engagements where he played alongside the likes of Frank Sinatra. Tony Bennett and Barbra Streisand. He was a member of the CBS music staff in the 1960s and 1970s. and also appeared in the pit bands for a number of Broadway shows, as well as both composing and playing on a number of film soundtracks. Illness prevented him continuing an active career in recent

Louis Cohen, physicist. died on July 28 aged 71. He was born on October 14, 1925.

THE British community of physicists owes an enormous debt to Dr Louis Cohen, who was executive secretary of the Institute of Physics for 24 years. During this period, the institute was seen by physicists as serving their needs and fighting their causes increasingly well. Institute membership rose by more than a half within six years of sthan a half within six years of :: his appointment in 1966.

When Cohen came to the institute, he found that the merger a few years earlier of the Physical Society and the Institute of Physics, each with a long history and its own traditions, had led to some resentment. He worked hard during his first years to make the new body successful, and gradually his personality and perseverance won over almost all of the members. By 1970, the institute was in a position

Louis Cohen had just taken up his post when a most embarrassing incident occurred. The institute's council, during the interregnum between execunive secretaries, had invited the Duke of Edinburgh to be-come an honorary fellow. It was only after the Duke accepted that it emerged that election to honorary fellowship required the agreement of the agreement was not obtained and it fell to Louis Cohen to carry out the unenviable task of informing the Palace of the changed situation. Consequently, Cohen made sure that the institute's bylaws were changed to place responsi-bility for election to honorary fellowship solely with council.

Cohen's management and negotiating skills, honed during his early career in industry, came to the fore in the 1970s, when the lease on the institute's premises in Bel-grave Square had only a decade or so to run. He negotiated successfully with the Grosvenor Estate for an extension of 75 years at most favourable terms. He knew that the estate had no wish to increase the number of embassies in the square, were loath to lease premises to commercial enterprises, and would have been in difficulty finding another suitable tenant.

Cohen always emphasised the importance of education in physics at all levels, both as mental training and as a vocational education second to none. Under his leadership, the institute established a reputation for supporting physics teachers and bringing an awareness of physics to the general public.

During his tenure, the institute became a world-leading physics publisher. He oversaw the integration of publishing activities at a new centre in Bristol, and the establishment of the publishing division as a limited

Cohen initiated many collaborative ventures. He played a leading role in the establishment of the European Physical Society. He served for many years on its executive committee and was honorary treasurer from 1968 to 1973. But for his dedication, the society might well have foundered in its early years. He was also instrumental in serting up the Council of Science and Technology Institutes, a forum for the presidents and chief executives of scientific institutes and societies.

Until his health failed, Cohen was an active member, and one-time secretary of the Physical Society Club. The club, with limited membership, was established by Rutherford, W. L. and W. H. Bragg and others in 1921, and continues to this day the tradition of discussing recent develor-ments in physics over and after a fine dinner. Louis Cohen was educated at Manchester Central High School, read physics at the University of Manchester and Imperial College, London, where he obtained his PhD. From 1953 to 1963 he was a research physicist with Si-mon-Carves and from 1963 to 1966 he worked as research manager for Pyrotenax in Newcastle upon Tyne. He was elected a member of the Instirute of Physics in 1949 and a fellow in 1956; in 1963 he was elected to the fellowship of the Royal Society of Arts.

He retired as executive secretary of the Institute of Physics in 1990, by which time he was confined to a wheelchair. He bore multiple disabilities with a grace and cheerfulness that earned the respect and admiration of all who knew him. Cohen maintained a lifelong connection with Manchester as a corresponding member of the Manchester Literary and Philosophical Society, of which at one time he had been secretary. He had an abliding incerest in classical music, opera and the theatre.

VEXED QUESTION. The inhabitants of this peaceable

metropolis have of late been frightened half out of their wits by the vision of armed figures stalking about the streets at all hours of the night. London is not in a state of siege. From the Hampstead hills to the distant Tooting, from the tollexacting bridge of Putney to the marine regions of Poplar and Shadwell, all is peace. The gusty patriotism of the specials and the well-drilled loyalty of the line have, in conjunction, of course, with the efforts of the regular police. clearly proved to the rabble of blackguards and maniacs who called themselves Chartists the mere inutility of their attempts to disturb the peace of the town. The ready response given by all classes of respectable citizens to the call when there was reasonable apprehension that the peace of the metropolis might be disturbed, the rigorous measures of the Government, backed as they were by the hearty support of both Houses of Parliament, and approved by sufficient to quell the hopes of disaffected and desperate men. Enough has been done. There is no reason why an attitude of hostility should be preserved which was clearly pointed against another order of things than that which actually obtains. We believe that the ordinalry truncheon of the police constable and the regular jurisdiction of the police magistrates will be quite sufficient to maintain order in the streets. We will the verdicts of various juries, have been not here repeat a string of common-preservation of good order in the streets of a large city densely thronged with men. For the sake, however, of the police themselves we regret that they should thus be taught to place reliance rather on the use of deadly weapons than upon the respect and terror their presence inspires in the minds of even the worst class of malefactors, because they are servants of the law. There exists now no reason for extraordinary precaution in the streets of London. We trust that the public and ordinary bearing of arms by the police force will be henceforth discontinued. We will not say that an addition of men to the police force is not necessary for the protection of life and property, but the Home Secretary who proposes such an addition is bound to make out a clear case of necessity, as under ordinary circumstances and in ordinary times. If the number of police be really insufficient for the safeguard of the town, there will be no difficulty in obtaining an increase.

THE FIMES TERS DAY AUGUST 7 1997

Caravan holidays are also ous British caravan owners are driving in convoy deep So "focused tours" based on into Eastern Europe as the wine-tasting, bird-watching, into Eastern Europe as the wine-tasting, bird-watching, of mobile holi- fishing and nature study are also being arranged throughout much of Europe.

The strong pound and ready availability of ferry and Channel Tunnel crossings to mainland Europe are mainly responsible for the growing number of caravans heading for the Confinent. But it reflects a general improvement in the health of the industry.

Sales of touring caravans are rising for the first time in eight years, and membership of the Camping and Caravar-ning Club has risen by 30 per cent over the past five years. It now has 276,800 members, the highest number in its 96-year

Tony Hailey, chairman of the Tourer Marketing Bureau, says: The tourer industry has turned the corner, and the popularity of caravanning is rising." Even so, the number of families owning tourer caravans is still about 150,000 less than its peak of 20 years ago, when 650,000 were on the roads.

Though caravans are now far better equipped — many have central heating, flush lavatories and fully equipped kitchens — prices have stabilised or even dropped, A between £7,000 and £20,000, and the biggest demand is from people aged between 45 and 50. The industry has done much to improve facilities on campsites throughout both Britain and Europe, while pressing for access to more remote fields for those seeking a quiet holiday.

As a result, the network owned by the Camping and Carvanning Club has had its busiest year ever, with occupancy up by more than 5 per cent on the previous record another swerve out of the slow West Country tourism officers said yesterday that the area is "beaving" with every caravan site fully booked.

Cornish farmers are taking advantage of the rule, which allows them to open up as caravan sites for 28 days without planning permission. However, some caravamers are not booking in advance and end up camping in laybys.

Around Newquay, sites are being used for camping that have not been used for years. Last Friday the tourist information centre had 1,800 visitors seeking somewhere to sleep.
This sector of the holiday market has grown so much that some areas are designared Tourism Restraint Areas. In 1992 John Williams was so angry at being stuck behind a caravan that he founded the Anti-Caravan Club, proposing that a dawn to dusk curfew be imposed on their movements.

To a limited extent - for those who can afford both the time and the money to find that special hideaway in Tuscany or idyllic hotel in Polynesia, and the airline to get them there - that may be

But for nine million Britons a year, a package is still the only way to go on holiday. Not only is the organisation of transport and accommodation done by someone else but the buying power of the tour operator brings costs tumbling down.

Try booking a hotel room as an individual — especially at peak times, for example or finding a seat to almost any Mediterranean resort. The problems involved in doing it yourself are obvious.

The package holiday is still very much alive, but is changing dramatically. There will always be demand for the simple package - the cheap deal, chosen from a brochure or from Teletext, offering a flight and room-only accommodation in a bustling "Blackpool on the Med resort. But now there is a new kind of short-haul holidaymaker who wants a bargain price but has plenty of spare cash to spend freely on entertainment, drinks and food while away. Thomson is convinced that these holidaymakers also want to feel different from other package tourists and will be prepared to pay extra to do so. So the company is offering private

Sceptics have been take them from the airport to the hotel, late check-out times at hotels, pre-booked seats on the aircraft, the use of the VIP lounge, or flowers and champagne on arrival at a price.

Though the scheme has only just been launched. executives are convinced that within a few years up to half their clients will use at least one of these flexible options.

The recent development of all-inclusive resorts - from Spain to the West Indies has enabled visitors to tell in advance exactly how much their holiday will cost.

Research by British Air-ways Holidays, which specialises in long-haul destinations, showed that only a third of clients took the exact holiday advertised in a brochure. More than 60 per cent wanted to change it, either by using different hotels or flights and generally wanting to make the package fit their requirements. Now the company is offering to "mix and match."

Saga, which is constantly forced to adapt to meet the demands of their older, welltravelled - and wealthy clients, has introduced the "add-on" concept. A core holiday of any length can be extended by short visits to other destinations nearby, organised as the travellers ruising is probably the ultimate package holiday. Both Thomson and Airtours, its arch rival, are developing their fleets of highly sophisticated ships at prices which are falling fast.

More than 60 per cent of the new generation of younger package holidaymakers spends a week at sea followed by a week in a hotel. This, then, is the future of package holiday - flexible, all-inclusive, exotic and still a heck of a lot cheaper than

Riots fail to harm Kenya tours

By LINSEY MCNEILL

BLOODY anti-government demonstrations and rising violence in Nairobi have failed to deter British holiday-makers from visiting Kenya, which is attracting more visitars from the UK than ever. Some tour operators say that bookings are up by as much as 40 per cent on last year, and Kenya's tourist office expects 11,000 additional visitors from the UK this year, up ten. per cent on 1996.

Sammy Kibt, deputy director of the Kenya National Tourist Office for the a family safari holiday for next year UK and Ireland, says: So far, charter that offers shorter game drives and flights and hotels have been fully more free time between excursions to hooked?

the end of October. Tour operators received several calls from worried clients last month after outbreak of violence in Nairobi, but ere were no cancellations. Decian Morton, product manager of Hayes & Jarvis, says: "The demonstrations have been confined to a small area in Nairobi, so holidaymakers are not in any danger. Most of our clients. fly direct to Mombasa, anyway.

He adds that bookings for Kenya slowed down right after newspaper reports of the protests, but have since bounced back. .

Jane Thornton, Kuoni's senior product manager, says: "We are having an excellent year. Safaris have been very. successful, probably because Kenya has had positive publicity on wildlife programmes on TV.

Prices start at £469 for sevian nights half-board at a coastal resort, and about £1,000 for a week-long safari — about two thirds the price of a similar holiday in Zimbabwe.

Encouraged by this year's strong demand for Kenya, Kuoni has expanded its product range for 1998, when it will be offering the first seven-night all-inclusive safari, with all meals, drinks and game drives thrown in.

Shorter safaris are proving more popular for first-time visitors seeking a beach holiday with a taste of the bush thrown in Several tour operators now offer one-day to three-night safaris as an extension to beach holidays, costing from £265. Inspirations has introduced suit young children.

Caledonian Airways has added a Dreams brochure for the coming winter and next year. It has added the African Dream Village and Tropical Village in Malindi and the Silver Beach Hotel on Bamburi Beach, both on the coast.

Kenya may lose business from couples planning to marry abroad, however, since the Government's decision to increase wedding administration fees by £100 to £150. Kuom, one of the biggest tour operators organising weddings in Kenya, says it had been given just 24 hours' notice of the rise. This will kill weddings in Kenya," Ms Thornton says. "It was our third or fourth most popular destination for couples getting married, but now the cost is too high."

The Federation of Tour Operators (FTO), which represents the UK's major travel companies, wrote last month to the Kenya National Tourist Office for clarification of legal fees, but it is still awaiting a reply.

Alan Flook, the FTO's secretarygeneral, says: "If Kenya wants to benefit from this market, it cannot raise fees at such short notice.

'Chiantishire' now offers value for all

BY IAN FLETCHER

THIS IS the second year that Tony Blair and his family have headed for "Chianti-shire", and the surrounding hills are filled with European leaders and some of Britain's wealthiest and most influential families. But tourist operators and officials are eager to sophasise that Tuscany, despite its upmarket image, offers a wide range of holi-

The pound's strength is also playing a part in ensuring that holidaymakers enjoy a: ordering from the menu and wine list in restaurants.

Yet even in peak season. tourism has not spoilt the friendly welcome that persuades visitors to return again and again to the historic towns and cities of this region. A. meal, or even a snack, in the breathtaking centre of a beautiful main square can, however, come at a premium. So the cost-conscious soon learn to follow the locals to the best better deal when it comes to and cheapest meals and local wines in side-street restaurants. The affordable lire means that prices are little different from those of the UK; a threecourse meal for two with wine costs about £25, a pint of beer £2.20 and a multi-flavoured

If the dramatic architecture and narrow cobbled streets of towns such as Siena and San Gimignano should pall, some of Italy's most glorious countryside is on the doorstep. A wildlife area and a Pinocchio nark are within easy reach of the town, so youngsters will find plenty to occupy them.

There are also countless medi-region's history and the cul-

lages clinging to mountains ropped with fortress towers. For many, the sunshine and shopping are the draw. But part of the appeal is the unhurried pace of life and the chance to step back in time to a region where people still pause to chat.

An Italiatours spokeswoman says: "The strong pound has made Italy the best deal for Britons for about ten years in terms of enjoying extra value. Where it was once seen ice cream less than a pound. as a older person's destination, Tuscany's appeal has now widened, Many more people of all ages enjoy the ture. After years of beach holidays, they are looking for something extra." A week in Tuscany by air. including hotel accommodation and visits to Florence and Siena, costs from £499. eval towns and ancient vil-

Big perks for small firms

By CATHERINE CHETWYND

A SERVICE aimed at small businesses has been launched by business travel agent Hogg Robinson BTI. Business Travel Direct allows small, independent companies to share some of the advantages enjoyed by large corporations. such as greater purchasing

Paul Reeve, divisional manager of Hogg Robinson. says: "Of the five million small companies registered in the UK, around one million have staff who travel regularly. These represent 20 per cent of the total business travel market, which is worth some £6 million in airline tickets alone." Hogg Robinson started to analyse the small companies market around 15 months ago and discovered that most of them rended to buy their tickets from high street leisure

"We were not making it easy for them," said Mr Reeve. "We impose credit vetting, minimum turnover requirements and do not even have a separate listing in Yellow

Business Travel Direct provides access to the discounted air fares and hotel rates enjoyed by larger clients such as the BBC, Coopers & Lybrand and Merrill Lynch. "In addition to financial advantages, the high street travel agent is not in a position to provide our back-up services, such as passport and visa procurements, foreign exchange and 24-hour emergency assistance 365 days a year." said Mr Reeve.

Other benefits include chauffeur parking at Heath-row, Gatwick and Manchester airports; mobile phone rentals, international calling cards and home delivery.

Tony Hughes, chairman of the Guild of Business Travel Agents, supports the move."It is always in a client's best interest to deal with a specialist," he said. "And a company should not be put off because it is small. There is always a business travel agent to deal with their business."

Although only 43 agents are registered with the GBTA, 80 per cent of business travel from the UK is booked through its members.

Hogg Robinson is also teaming up with banks, providing services to smaller companies with corporate cards through a special number. Business Travel Direct can be reached on 0990 673048.
